77. Asst. Deacon : Lord pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons, and all the Christian people.

78. Priest : Remember those, and rest the souls of them all, and cause them to grow by the flowing water in the garden of paradise in Thy holy houses in the bosoms of Abraham. Isaac and Jacob, by Thine angels who are the leaders of light, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Thy beloved Son.

84. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

85. Priest : gave thanks, blessed (+ three times) and broke,

86. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess ; we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God ; that this is He we truly believe.

87. Priest : And likewise also He gave thanks over the cup : (+ three times)

He shall point at the cup, then move it with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

88. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess.

89. Priest : To those who worship Him, it is a wonderful sign, to those who crucified Him it is a place of judgement. That which was written with His blood, stamped with His crucifixion, and honoured with His death is for eternal life for the remission of sin.

Likewise make a remembrance of Me as often as ye are gathered together.

90. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection.

ANAPHORA OF JOHN SON OF THUNDER

91. Priest : We, who are gathered together to make remembrance of Thy sufferings and partake in Thy resurrection from the dead, beseech Thee, Lord our God, as this bread which was scattered along the mountains and the little hills, in the forests and in the vales, being gathered together, became one perfect bread,¹ likewise gather us together, through Thy divinity, out of all evil thought of sin into Thy perfect faith.

92. As with the mixture of this wine with water, the one cannot be separated from the other, so let Thy divinity be united with our humanity, and our humanity with Thy divinity, and let Thy greatness be united with our humility and our humility with Thy greatness. Lord accept this our offering from us for a memorial of righteousness before Thee.

93. Like Abel we offer to Thee a pure oblation and like all those who are blameless, with whom Thy majesty was pleased, the memorial of whose everlasting offerings is before Thee

94. Like the prudent Noah and all the meek upon whom Thy divinity rests. Thou exalted them, through Thy kindness, to grant them a good portion and inheritance, with eternal life, in the kingdom of heaven together with all those who obeyed Thee,

95. Like our meek fathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob who did good, left (this world) in purity and reign in righteousness,

96. Like Thy servant Moses and all the prophets who preached to us without fear and proclaimed Thee without doubting that they would receive their reward in full.

97. like Simon Peter and all Thy disciples, like Paul and all Thy holy apostles who bore Thy Gospel through that which they suffered and sustained the preaching of Thy doctrine in their death,

98. like Stephen and all Thy martyrs who shed their blood because of Thy shed blood, so that they might receive honour from Thy glory, whose names were written in the book of life¹, in the free Jerusalem, in heaven which is truly our mother. We have believed in Thy holy church.

99. Lord our God, Thy church prays to Thee and worships Thee, Thy bride² exalts Thee, and Thy people praise Thee.

100. Through the prayer of the perfect, through the worship of the saints, through the supplication of the watchful,³ through the advocacy of the angels, through the praise of the archangels, through the hallowing of the seraphim, through the honouring of the cherubim, through the highness of all the high let the gate of light be opened, and let the doors of glory be unlocked, and let Thy living Holy Spirit come, descend, light upon, linger and dwell upon and bless the offering of this bread, and sanctify the cup,

101. and make this bread the communion of Thy body, O Life-giver (+ once upon the Body) and make this cup also the communion of Thy blood, giver of mercy (+ once upon the Cup, then + once more upon both the Body and the Cup).

People : Amen. Lord, pity us; Lord spare us; Lord have mercy upon us.

102. Deacon : With all our heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good Communion of the Holy Spirit.

103. People : To everyone who believes in the living Father, in the only-begotten Son Who arose from Him and in the Holy Spirit Who is unsearchable, and to him who partakes of Thy body and thy blood let them be for hope, salvation, forgiveness of sin, resurrection from the dead, light in the kingdom of heaven and everlasting life. Amen.

At this time he shall sign the Body with the Blood.

104. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

105. Priest : Uniting them¹ together, grant to all that take of these, that they may be unto them for holiness and for filling with the Holy Spirit, so that we may thank Thee always and Thy beloved Son Jesus Christ, unto ages of ages. Amen.

109. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven . . . (see #III : 23, p. 21)

110. Priest : O Lord, almighty, Father of our Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ, we offer our prayer to Thee and supplicate Thee through all and in all, because Thou has made us worthy again to fulfil this holy mystery, and grant that this may be a blessing to us.

111. Do not suffer anyone of us to be guilty, and suffer it not to be a pleasure of the flesh, but let it be to all of us a refreshment of the soul to receive Thy holy mystery through our Lord Jesus Christ, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto endless ages. Amen.

112. Priest : Before the glory of Thy holiness Thy servants and handmaids have prostrated themselves in soul and body and spirit ; incline Thine ear unto their supplication, and purify them from all uncleanness of body and soul that they may receive Thy holy mystery and be united through it : Through Thine only-begotten Son, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. 116. Asst. Deacon : Open the gates, ye princes.

117. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

118. Priest : What blessing? With what speech might we glorify, what word, what praise, what thanksgiving, and what name are we to proclaim over this bread which will be broken, save Thy name, Jesus Christ, Whose name is Giver of life and Saviour?

119. This bread of life which descended from heaven is for the salvation of the world. We bless Thee who became for us the way to the place of life.

120. We offer thanksgiving to Thee Who through Thy word created all. Thou art the leader, Thou art the door of grace, Thou art the salt, Thou art the pearl of great price, Thou art the net of life; righteousness art Thou, power, wisdom, refuge, rest, help and salvation. It is Thou, being called after these names, Who became man through love of men, in order that they may be saved and renewed from the former open evil works into which they fell through sin. Glory be to Thee, unto the ages of ages.

121. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

124. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 92-93: p. 49)

People : shall repeat his words.

Deacon : Pray ye.

128. Priest : O almighty Lord, we beseech Thee through all and in all because Thou has hid these things¹ from those who pretended to be wise and prudent and revealed them to us the meek.

129. Yea, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight. Grant that our receiving of Thy holy mystery be not unto condemnation nor unto judgement but unto the remission of sin and for everlasting life and for true knowledge. Grant us this we beseech Thee.

130. And as Thou hast made us worthy to receive Thy holy mystery in this world, so also make our portion to be with Thy saints in the forthcoming resurrection from the dead, through our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, through whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto endless ages. THE ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY¹

1. The Anaphora of our Lady, the Virgin Mary, mother of God, which Abba Heryacos² Bishop of the Province of Behnesa, composed through the Holy Spirit.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give thanks to our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

3. Priest : My heart indites a good deliberation ; my heart ponders a worthy concept ; my heart exclaims a noble oracle.

4. And I speak of the Anaphora of Mary, not at length but briefly. And I speak the praise of the Virgin, not in many words, which would be forgotten, but in few. And I speak of the exaltation of the Virgin.

- a. most feast days of St. Mary.
- b. 28th Tahesas (January 6), the day preceding the Nativity of Christ
- c. 29th Megabit (April 7), the memorial day of the Annunciation.
- d. 2nd Tekemit (October 12), the memorial day of St. Heryacos, Bishop of Behnesa.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

5. And today I stand, this very day, in humility and love before this mighty mystery and before this table and offering.

6. Truly this is the offering which those whose spirits are defiled cannot taste. It is not like the sacrifice of the forefathers which depended upon the blood of sheep, oxen and cows, but it is fire.¹

7. It is fire,⁽²⁾ giving life to the upright in heart who fulfill His will. It is a consuming fire to the unrighteous who deny His name.

8. Truly it is a fire² that even the fire clad cherubim and seraphim cannot touch.

9. O Mary, for this we love and exalt you, because you bore for us the true Food of righteousness and the true Drink of life.

10. O our fathers, consecrated by the laying on of hands, successors of the apostles, whom we have taken as intercessors towards God, also, during our days, we take as representatives between us and God these two: The Patriarch of the great City of (____), Abba (____), and the blessed Archbishop, Abba (____), the primate of our country.

11. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed, happy, prosperous, holy and pure Virgin Mary, our Lady, Parent of God, glorified by all.

12. And for the sake of the holy, honourable, spiritual, heavenly and mighty archangels; and for the sake of John the Baptist, the preacher and fore-runner. And for the sake of the holy and glorified ministers, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, the four Evangelists:

14. And for the sake of all saints and martyrs who have gone to their rest in the true faith: Paul, Timothy, Silas, and Barnabas, Titus, Philemon and Clement, the seventy-two disciples, the five hundred brethren, the three hundred and eighteen orthodox.

15. Lord, remember each and all; also the holy Patriarch Abba (_____), and the blessed and holy Archbishop Abba (_____) to preserve their life, save them, forgive their sin, and to have compassion upon us through their prayers, unto endless ages.

70. Now we hear the wicked Jews and the unrighteous Ishmaelites, who, being without understanding, say God is one person and one body ; they are of a blind heart.

71. Now we see the idolatrous heathen whose idols are many and whose devils are many.

72. But we follow the leaders to the good way as the Apostles taught us saying : it is as if

73. The Father is the sun, the Son is the sun, and the Holy Spirit is the sun : but it is one sun of righteousness over all.

74. The Father is fire, the Son is fire, and the Holy Spirit is fire ; but it is one fire of life in the highest heaven.

75. The Father is the dawn, the Son is the dawn, and the Holy Spirit is the dawn : but it is a single eastern dawn through which, by the ray of its light, the darkness was destroyed.

76. The Father is the vine, the Son is the vine and the Holy Spirit is the vine: but it is one vine of life from which all the world tasted.

77. The Father is milk, the Son is milk and the Holy Spirit is milk: but it is one milk¹ unmixed.

78. Thus we believe and thus we confess and say the creed.

79. The people shall say the creed of the 318. (Anaphora of the Three Hundred #1 - 10: p. 86).

80. Let us now return again to peak of the holy Virgin, speaking of her conception which is wonderful to all, and saying: O Virgin, when there abode in your womb the fire of the Godhead, Whose face is fire, Whose clothes are fire, Whose covering is fire, how did it not burn you?

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

81. In what part of your womb were the seven curtains of the flame of fire prepared and spread ? Were they in the right or the left side while you were such a small body?

82. In what part of your womb was the glittering cherubic throne, compassed by the flame of fire, prepared and planted while you were a young bride?

83. How wonderful it is! A mother and a maid ; the narrowness of the womb and the infinite; conception without intercourse, as a bee conceives, from the voice of a word; milk ⁽¹⁾ with virginity.

84. When I think of this, my mind likes to swim in the depth of your Son's seas, and the billows from the hiding-place of your Beloved sweep across it.

85. Again when I think of this my mind likes to soar and ascend secretly and draw back the curtains of the hiding-places of the Living One ; it becomes afraid of the flame of fire and does not reach even one-fourth of the way to heaven.

86. When I think of this my mind likes to mount the shoulders of the winds to fly east, west, north and south to all the ends (of the world) to see the nature of the creatures, to measure the depths of the seas and to know the height of heaven, and travelling thus to every part it becomes faint and returns again to its former place.

(1) i.e. Milk to feed her baby even though she was a virgin.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

87. Now let us not further enquire or even think of the greatness and profundity of Him Whose grandeur cannot worthily be praised, no, not by the tongues of the prophets nor of the apostles.

88. He is the mighty One Whom none can discern by subtle device_ but He became humble among us; He is the most high, to Whom none can attain_ but among us He took upon Him the form of a servant; He is the impalpable fire, but we saw Him and felt Him and ate and drank with Him.

Now let us praise Him saying.

89. People : Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal (See “Preparatory Service” # 174 : p. 33 and “Anaphora of St. John Chrysostom” #64 - 67 : pp. 139 - 140).

90. O Virgin who gives the fruit that can be eaten, and the spring of that which can be drunk

91. O Bread got from you, that gives life and salvation to those who eat of it in faith.

92. O Bread got from you, that is as hard as the stone of Admas ⁽¹⁾ which cannot be chewed, to those who do not eat of it in faith.

93. O Cup got from you, that helps those who drink of it in faith to indite wisdom, and that gives them life.

94. O Cup got from you, that intoxicates those who do not drink of it in faith and causes them to stumble and fall and adds sin to them instead of the remission of sin

(1) A rocky place presumed to be between the earth and the ocean.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

95. And now let us glorify Him saying Glory be to Thee, glory to Thy kingdom, glory with pure incense we offer to Thee.

96. At this time he shall offer incense.

People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom. . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles, #34: p. 43).

97. Priest : Jesus Christ, Son of the living God, from Whom is found every good gift and every perfect gift, became man, fulfilled all the law of man yet without sin, and practiced the law of the Hebrews.

98. He was baptized by John, tempted in the wilderness, hungered and thirsted and did miracles.

99. In the same night in which He gave His soul to death He showed His disciples many signs concerning His sufferings, crucifixion, death, His resurrection on the third day with body and soul, with bone and blood, as it was before, when His disciples were with Him on His right and left, and when there was counted with them Judas whose creation was like the tares added to wheat, and who betrayed Him.

100. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

101. Priest : At that time Jesus Christ took bread in his holy, blessed, pure and spotless hands

102. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

103. Priest : He looked up to heaven towards Thee His Father, interceded with His parent, and committed his disciples to Him to keep them from all evil:

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

Blessed while He (it) was blessed (+ three times), broke while He (it) was holy

104. Then he shall indent the Host slightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

105. And gave it to His disciples and said unto them : take, eat this (pointing) bread is My body which will be given to you as a propitiation for the whole world.

106. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God: that this is He we truly believe.

107. Priest : And likewise also the cup (+ three times) after supper : He pointed and said : Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood which the spear will shed for your sake.

108. He shall then move, the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross

109. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess.

110. Priest : And as often as you do this, do it in remembrance of My death, and proclaim the remembrance of My resurrection.

111. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection, we believe in Thine ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and beg Thee, O our Lord and our God.

112. Priest : O Our Lord, as it happened then bless, break and give this (pointing) bread (+ once).

People : Amen.

ANAPHORA OF ST MARY

113. Priest : Our Lord as it happened then bless, hallow and give this (pointing) cup (+ once over the cup, and + once more over both).

People : Amen.

114. Priest : And this my ministry, purify and accept it and may it please Thee.

People : Amen.

115. Priest : And this priest who is with me to help me in this ministry, and me, make like Joseph and Nicodemus who wrapped Thy body.

People : Amen.

116. Priest : And this deacon sent according to the law of ministry, suffer to reach our great rank of priesthood, and make him full of grace, righteousness and favour like Stephen who saw the Trinity and marvelled and was astonished through the descent of the Holy Spirit.

People : Amen.

117. Priest : And this people who have gathered together in Thy holy church with priests and deacons, great and small, make worthy to take Thy holy mystery ; have compassion and do not judge them.

People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord Spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

118. Priest : Lord, have mercy upon us, O Christ (three times).

The people shall repeat his words.

119. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

120. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

121. He then shall dip his finger into the Blood and+ sign the Body.

Priest : Grant it to all of them that take of it, that it may be unto them for everlasting life.

122. Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

123. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

124. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

125. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

126. The priest The Prayer of Fraction:

God, Maker of all, the Source of all, the Completer of all, the Almighty, the Holder of all, Thou art He Whom angels, archangels, thrones, authorities, lords, powers, the sun, the moon, the stars and the whole creation worship, because they are His subjects, dominions, and are ruled by Him. Though He was rich in everything yet He became poor in everything.

127. Love drew the mighty Son down from His throne and led Him to death.

128. O Ox, Who with Thy hand made no effort against those who draw Thee, but bowed down Thy neck to those who would slay Thee.

129. O Sheep dumb before Thy shearers ; O Patience Who did not open Thy mouth at the time of Thy sufferings before those who pierced Thee

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

130. O Bread found in the treasure, which Joseph obtained in merchandise, in which also he found the pearl of great price

131. O Cup found in the house into which no man entered,

132. O this sign of the cross ⁽¹⁾ separated from this host without being divided or alienated, but its appearance, taste and softness are the same :

133. As His divinity was not separated or divided from His humanity so also this sign of the cross¹ is not separated or divided from this host

134. Likewise also let Thy greatness be united with our humility and our humility with Thy greatness, Thou almighty Lord our God.

135. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven .

136. Priest : Let us hear then, till our last breath, this word through which we will be accused, judged and forgiven.

137. As the Son came from the heaven of heavens for judgement and mercy, this bread will be accused, judge and forgiver.

138. Let the soul fear, the nerves tremble and the door of the heart be broken by this terrible word.

139. Now this divine bread has been broken and this life-giving cup has been prepared. Let him who desires to take, come: but first examine yourselves and cleanse your bodies.

140. If there is anyone who is impure, let him not approach, and if there is any one who hath fallen into sin, let him not forget it because it must not be forgotten.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

141. If there is any one who disdains this holy communion, let him not approach, but let him be prevented. As you see, this bread is not as perishable as the earthly bread ⁽¹⁾, but it is the fire of the godhead ⁽²⁾.

142. What mouth is that which takes in this bread, what teeth are those which masticate this bread, and what stomach is that which can contain this bread?

143. And now let us say According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins.

144. People : According to Thy mercy (thrice).

145. Afterwards the people shall say :

The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world.

And let us come before the face of the Saviour of the world to praise Christ in faith that is His.

146. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

147. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

148. We lay our souls before Thee, Lord, maker of all, the invisible God. We humble ourselves to Thee, the humbler of all. We worship Thee, Who created all to worship Thee. We serve Thee, ruler of all.

149. O Thou Who discovers that which is hidden and covers as in secret all that is open.

(1) John 6 : 27.

(2) Rm. 1 : 20

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

O Thou Who is able to send forth that which is within and take within that which is without, hear now the cries of Thy people who call upon Thee in righteousness.

150. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

151. The priest shall say "The Prayer of Penitence." (Anaphora of the Apostles: 72 - 88: pp. 47 - 48).

152. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

153. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Then the priest shall raise the whole Host with his hand and chant :

Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant).

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall chant three times : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ.

The people shall chant twice : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ.

154. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

155. Then the priest shall turn to the people and say Lord our God . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles, 95 - 126: pp. 49 - 52).

156. After receiving (the Holy Communion) the following prayer shall be said instead of "The Pilot of the Soul :"

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

Priest: O ye, Christian people, as ye have gathered together on this day, so also may He gather you on the holy Mount of Sion and in the free Jerusalem in heaven ⁽¹⁾.

157. And as ye have heard this voice of Mary's praise, likewise may He allow you to hear the word of the infants' harps and the angels' song, which softens even the very bones because of the multitude of its melodies.

158. May He lead you where there were stretched out the tabernacles of the flaming fire wherein the High Priest is, and wherein are the icon of His face, the pure crown, and the bright dress which the hand of man did not make, but it was woven above.

159. May He lead you to where are the congregation of the holy prophets, the congregation of the preaching Apostles, the congregation of the victorious martyrs, the congregation of the blessed righteous, the congregation of the ordained priests, the congregation of the watchful angels, and the congregation of virgins and perfect monks, with all the perfect congregations of the one holy universal church, and with them where there is the Ark of the wilderness, that is our Lady Mary.

160. Let us not henceforth be decked with haughtiness or pride which clothe with death and lead down to Hades.

161. Let us henceforth have humility with purity, not only purity of the flesh because the prophets saw the Lord through purity of the spirit, seeing Him face to face.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

162. Let us henceforth have love and meekness like the apostles, because they loved their Lord Who granted them authority like His own to bind and loose the bonds of wickedness.

163. Let us henceforth have silence and patience like Mary because our Lord praised her saying : And Mary has chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.¹

164. And now let us pray the Lord our God, giver of grace.

Deacon : Pray ye.

165. Priest : O Virgin, remind Him Who remembers, not forgetting any.

166. O Virgin, remind Him of His birth, delivered from you at Bethlehem, of His being wrapped in swaddling clothes and His being warmed by the breath of ass and cow on the cold days.

167. O Virgin, remind Him of his flight with you when you fled from one country to another in the days of the cursed Herod.

168. O Virgin, remind Him of the bitter tears shed from your eyes and dropped on the face of your beloved Son.

169. O Virgin, remind Him of hunger, thirst, poverty, sadness and all the trouble which you suffered together with Him.

170. Remind Him of mercy and not of destruction. Remind Him of compassion and not of anger.

171. Remind Him of the sinners and not of the righteous. Remind him of the impure and not the pure.

172. And now let us glorify the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, both now and ever, and unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

ANAPHORA OF ST. MARY

173. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand Prayer.

We offer thanksgiving to God for all the graces He has granted and because He granted his Mother to be glorified through this Anaphora, and because He made us worthy to begin it through His kindness, and through His will to complete it, He to Whom be glory and Who is wise, unto endless ages. Amen.

174. (I found in it the understanding that any priest who celebrates this anaphora does not sanctify Mary but he himself will be sanctified, and all those who hear it will be sanctified, because our Lady Mary is always¹ sanctified in heaven and earth.)

175. May the accepted blessing of her prayer, the perfect gift of her help, and the compassion of her beloved Son, filling the ends (of the world), be with our rulers (. . .) unto the close of the age. Amen.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

THE ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED (1)

All: The Prayer of Faith (2)

1. We believe in one God the Father almighty, maker of heaven, earth and all things visible and invisible.

2. And we believe in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of the Father Who was with Him before the creation of the world:

3. Light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, of one essence with the Father

4. By Whom all things were made, and without Him was not anything in heaven or earth made

5. Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, was made man and was incarnate from the Holy Spirit and from the holy Virgin Mary.

6. Became man, was crucified for our sakes in the days of Pontius Pilate, suffered, died, was buried and rose from the dead on the third day as was written in the holy scriptures,

(1)The 318 bishops, who attended ecumenical Council held at Nicaea in 325 A.D., settled many contemporary doctrinal controversies, some wrote about those issues. This Anaphora reflects their efforts.

It is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. 21st Maskerem (October 1), the memorial day of the Virgin Mary.
- b. 8th Hedar (November 17), the Feast of the Four Beasts.
- c. 9th Hedar (November 18), the opening day of the Council of Nicaea.
- d. 24th Hedar (December 3), the Feast of the Twenty-four heavenly Priests.
- e. Nativity of Christ, 29th Tahesas (January 7).
- f. 13th Ter (January 21), the Feast of Caana of Galilee.
- g. the memorial day of any of the righteous.

(2) The creed given by the Council of Nicaea (325 A. D.) and the Council of Constantinople (381 A.D.)

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

7. Ascended in glory into heaven, sat at the right hand of His Father, and will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead ; there is no end of His reign.

8. And we believe in the Holy Spirit (1), the life-giving God, who proceeds from the Father; we worship and glorify Him with the Father and the Son ; Who spoke by the prophets,

9. and we believe in one holy, universal, apostolic church,

10. and we believe in one baptism for the remission of sins, and wait for the resurrection from the dead and the life to come, unto endless ages. Amen.

11. The Anaphora of the Three Hundred and Eighteen Orthodox, may their prayers and their blessings be with our (head of state : King, Queen, President, . . .) unto ages of ages. Amen.

12. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God,

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

- (1) This marks the end of the what the Fathers at Nicaea settled, and the beginning of what was decided by the Second Council, at Constantinople in 381. That concluded more than fifty years of debates on how best to describe these mysteries. Such had been part of the Church's life since Apostolic times, but, not yet stated so succinctly. Some of the same leaders who negotiated pronouncements on these doctrines, also applied the same criteria in deciding the contents of what today is known as "The Bible."

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

13. Priest : The Lord is mighty in the clouds, higher than heaven, glorious in all His ways, the perfect victorious God of gods.

14. There is no time in which He was not, and there is no place where He cannot be found, there is no time when He was perfectly seen in His divinity. No one can see Him, and no one knows how He lives.

15. Heaven and earth together with all their worlds, sea and rivers and all things that are in them glorify Him. All were created through His grace, and all live through His kindness. He is one Father of the One, Father of the Lord, Father of Messiah, true light with Him Who begets Him.

16. Deacon : Answer ye.

People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

17. Priest : We proclaim that the Father lives with His Son, and that the Son lives with His Father before creation, and before the heavens and earth were made

18. and before the mountains and the little hills arose, and before the height of the sky was seen, and before the power of the wind breathed,

19. and before the thunderbolt flashed, and before the quickness of lightning was seen, and before the thunder thundered, and before the clouds were spread,

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

20. and before the creation of angels, and before any name was named under heaven and on earth.

21. No one, thinking deeply, can understand His nature, though He ascends to heaven and goes beyond the lords and meets with the four living creatures¹, full of eyes, whose whole bodies are light, and from whose mouths comes out the likeness of flaming fire; again, though he descends down to earth and goes beyond the sea, the wind and the fire; again, though He goes out thence to search upon the right hand and the left, setting His thought on high and spreading it abroad

22. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

23. Priest : Even so he cannot discern among the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit to know what is His nature.

24. The Father begets His Son, but it is impossible to say that He begat Him at such a time, or that He begat Him on such and such a day.

25. His birth from the Father is unsearchable because it passes understanding, and His nature is unknown because it is hidden. He is the right hand of His Father, His arm and His beloved Son Who is of the same essence with Him.

26. Deacon : Look to the east.

27. Priest : The Father begets His Son ; but He begets Him, not that He might be His assistant in work, to serve Him as a man is served who is in need. When He created heaven and earth no one helped Him because He is mighty.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

28. He did not become weary, nor does He rest as man rests, but the sword of fire coming out of His mouth, what He has spoken is immediately accomplished; instantly whatever He has thought is fulfilled: He is the thought of thoughts;¹ He is the Wise, the Creator.

29. Who, like Him, lives in the highest heaven, builds the foundation², bears up from beneath, sits upon the firmament on high, establishes upon the floods, builds with very small particles, wraps with invisible things, limits with sand, strengthens with wind, hangs the water up, and calls it sky,

30. congealed liquid in the womb, turning it into flesh, binds it with muscles, strengthening it with sinews, numbers the very hairs, tries the heart and knows the reins?

31. The Father begets His Son without days or hours; and as He begets Him, His Father is not separated from Him. Before He created the angels for His worship His glory was infinite; the glory of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit was perfect.

32. Deacon : Let us give heed.

33. Priest : And when He created our father, Adam He did not go about to gather earth, water, wind, and fire, nor did He leave His throne or in any way move from it

34. Yes, while He was yet there, He took the four elements: two palpable, and two impalpable; three visible and one invisible

² i.e. the foundation of the earth.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

35. and made him from these, made him fair with His holy hands, kissed him and loved him; and breathed in his nostrils the breath of life. Before He built the skies and the highest heavens He was not lowly, but was strong in His throne and great in His kingdom.

36. He thundered to those that were above, caused those beneath to tremble as He trod the clouds, burned without fire and cooled without water.

37. And when He created the sun and the moon, it was not to make light for Himself as for one in darkness, but it was as though He gave them a little from His own light, as it were, no more than a grain of wheat. Thus they gave light to man.

38. Having created and prepared all, visible and invisible, He did not boast saying, I have worked and I have finished and I have to rest from all the toil in which I have laboured, but He knew before it came to pass, He completed before ever He made possible righteous and unrighteous, good and evil.

39. Before He created man, He prepared Paradise to put therein him whom He loved, and the fire of hell to put therein him who hated.

40. Blessed is he whom He had chosen, and blessed is he in whom He was pleased. Let us therefore receive this word with great diligence that we may not enter into the great sea wherein fire and water are mingled and from which we cannot escape by swimming.

41. But let us receive what the apostles taught us about the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit saying, The Father declares of His Son, that He is Jesus Christ His only One:

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

And the Son tells that God the Father begets Him

And the Holy Spirit proclaims that He proceeds from the Father and took of the things of the Son. (1)

42. It is one honour and one authority and one power which cannot be divided. There is neither reckoning nor separation of His position. There is neither subtraction nor addition in His divinity.

43. As our Lord answered His disciples about Their nature saying, We have neither first nor last, We have neither right nor left, We have neither firmament nor foundation, We are the firmament, and We are the foundation.

44. None can see Us and none can know how We live. We know all and we understand all, We make remote that which is near and bring near that which is afar off. We ignore the noise of the tongue as one who does not hear (2). We know the whisper of the heart within.

45. My Father, I, and the Holy Spirit are the gate, the door, and the dwelling-place.

46. My Father, I, and the Holy Spirit are might, grace, and favour.

47. My Father, I, and the Holy Spirit are sun, light and heat.

48. My Father, I, and the Holy Spirit are fire, flame and the burning coal.

49. Such is Our existence, such is Our perfection, and Our days are not finite but they endure for ever. Again there is neither counting nor end (of them).

(1) John 16:15.

(2) Isaiah 1:15.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

50. Deacon : Let your thoughts be above. Let your hearts be in heaven. Know where you stand.

51. Priest : He is slow to anger, His compassion is great, and He is righteous. It is not as if there was a time when He is patient and another when He is impatient. He waits for the sinner until he comes back and returns to Him.

52. When He was angry He destroyed the wicked with the flood and saved eight souls who kept His word, and He established with their father an everlasting covenant of righteousness. He is God of gods, consuming fire, and life-giving fire.

53. What is His name, and what is His Son's name? (1) Where is His dwelling-place and where is His country?

54. His throne is compassed by fire and His abode is enveloped by water, and round the roof of His house hang drops of water which do not fall.

Flashes of light go out from His throne, within it is like blazing fire, in it there is great light like the winter rainbow, round it there is lightning.

55. At the sides of that throne there are four animals as if they carry on their heads the large throne which is as white as snow.

56. Round about that throne there are twenty four priests (2) in front of them they see the likeness of the lamb, the vesture dipped in blood (3), and the sealed book. (4)

57. Every time they go round that throne they prostrate themselves

(1) Prov. 30:4.

(2) Rev. 4:4.

(3) Rev. 19 : 13

(4) Rev. 5 : 1 & 2

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

thrice before the likeness of the Lamb, the vesture dipped in blood, and the sealed book. The smoke of glory fills the pavilion. From beneath that throne springs the sea of two courses, the sea of light and the sea of wind.

58. The God of gods does not live there, the Lord of lords is not limited therein, but He both lives without and is found within.

59. They do not go to find him, and He is not absent when they seek Him. He is not felt when they take hold of Him because He is far above thought.

60. He keeps the rich, lives with the poor, loves the humble, and neglects the haughty. He will justify when He likes, save when He is pleased, He disregards as if He does not hear, keeps silent as if He does not see, waits as if He does not know, delays as if He does not wish to grant.

61. He is the God of gods, the Lord of lords, the Lord of the strong, before Whom the angels and archangels prostrate themselves.

62. They do not prostrate themselves before Him because they see Him, but they prostrate themselves before His throne and praise His greatness. They fly towards the four ends of the world to do all His will. Seraphim and cherubim shout and say, yet without pride, Holy God, holy mighty, holy living, immortal, Who yet died for the love of man.

63. From the one treasury ⁽¹⁾ formed from the breath of His mouth proceed and grow the souls who multiply in the world.

(1) i.e. Adam or one baptism.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

64. In one treasury there will be gathered wheat without tares. There will be put and kept the souls of the righteous until all are rewarded according to their deeds.

65. There are pleasure and happiness. There is Adam, the father of all. There are Abel, Seth, and Enoch the patriarchs together with all their seed.

66. There are Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the friends of the Lord. There are Moses and Aaron the priests. There are David, Hezekiah and Josiah and all the kings of a right faith.

67. There are the prophets with their prophecies, there are the disciples of the One, in whose hands are the keys, sitting at the door to take in whom they will.

68. There are the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests and deacons who gave full account of their stewardship which was entrusted unto them by their Lord.

69. There are martyrs whose crowns shine seven times brighter than the sun. There are the righteous in their patience.

70. There are men and women, the hosts of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit whose number cannot be known. They live there in pleasure and happiness till they receive twofold more than before ⁽¹⁾.

71. There live in honour the righteous, the meek and the elect. O Lord we offer our prayer unto Thee Who answers, Who is the hearer and the helper.

(1) i.e. more than they get in paradise, the waiting place of the righteous.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

72. We beg Thee, Lord, on behalf of those who have fallen asleep and departed from this corruptible world, and on behalf of those of whom the authority of death took hold, and of those who are covered within the grave.

73. We pray Thee, Lord, and beseech Thee to call them to an honourable resurrection when Thou will raise the body, uniting it with the spirit, and when Thou gives that good gift which eye has not seen, nor ear heard. Neither has it entered into the heart of man, (1) which Thou prepared through Thy Son Jesus Christ, unto endless ages.

74. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed (Anaphora of the Apostles #6-9: p. 43).

75. Asst. Priest : Prayer of Benediction (Anaphora of the Apostles #10-21: pp. 43, 44).

76. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

77. Priest : God the Father sent His only-begotten Son to abide in the body of a daughter who did not know a husband; and the creator of infants was kept in the womb without being limited. He was made man while He was God, and was born while He was the fire of the Godhead, and grew without adornments or honour. And grew like the children of the poor, chastened greatly and obeying His relatives.

78. He bowed His head to be baptized by a servant, though He was pure from sin. He did miracles, changing water into wine and satisfying many thousands in the wilderness.

79. At this time he shall cense.

People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom. (Thrice) (Anaphora of the Apostles #34: p. 45).

80. Priest : Oh ! The eyes of that generation were blinded so that they might not see Him, and their ears were made deaf so that they might not listen to Him, and their hearts were closed so that they might not know Him, they determined Him who forgives sin to be a mere man, and judged the judge of judges.

81. He chose twelve apostles from among them, walked with them and showed them the mysterious order of the Holy Communion.

82. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

83. Priest : He took bread before them, At this time he shall raise the bread.

84. People : We believe that this is He; truly we believe.

85. Priest : blessed, (+ three times, then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation), and said, Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body which will be given on your behalf for the remission of sin.

86. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God; that this is He we truly believe.

87. Priest : And likewise also the cup, He blessed (+ three times) and hallowed and said, Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood which will be shed on your behalf for the remission of sin.

He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

88. Priest : At that time Jesus said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death, the death which will make the sad rejoice.

89. In that night they took hold of Him, and when it was day the masters of the Jews and the chief priests sat with Pilate, the ruler, in the court for His judgement.

90. They shackled Him with His hands behind Him like a thief, and He followed them in love like a meek sheep. They sat at the court to judge Him. They made Him to stand before them, Him before whom the hosts of angels stand in fear and trembling.

91. An evil servant strengthened his hand to strike the innocent One they impudently bowed before Him to Whom the archangels bow in great trembling.

92. They crowned the Head of life with a crown of thorns, stripping Him, they clothed Him, Who is dressed in light as a garment, with a scarlet robe (1).

93. They took him to the place of crucifixion called Calvary, burdening Him with His cross, so that Jesus was wearied in the carrying of His cross and sweated because it was heavy.

94. They numbered him among the thieves, raised Him upon the cross, and crucified Him without mercy, according to their law.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

95. Oh! The hands which formed Adam were nailed on the cross. Oh! The feet which walked in paradise were nailed on the cross.

96. Oh ! The mouth which breathed the breath of life into the face of Adam drank vinegar and myrrh mixed with gall.

97. Jesus groaned in His suffering, cried to His Father, bowed His head and gave up the ghost.

98. They pierced Him in His side with a black spear, which they had prepared for Him, took Him down from the tree and buried Him in the grave. They did not put Him in their own grave, but outside in a stranger's grave of three cubits, and closed it with a stone.

99 While He was there He cried toward Adam His servant, and all his children.

100. Priest: The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God. Our Father, ho art in heaven. (Thrice) Thou art our Lord and our God.

101. Priest : When he said this to Adam, His servant, Adam rejoiced, went out with all his children and entered into the holy city, as it was said. (1)

102. And also, to reveal the glory of His resurrection, He revealed a little of His divinity ⁽¹⁾ and caused those who were watching His grave fall down.

103. And He rose on the third day, and on the day, which He had made known, entered where His disciples were and showed them His pierced side and His nail-marked hands. He stayed with them teaching them concerning the kingdom of heaven.

104. On the fortieth day He ascended unto heaven to His Father who sent Him. Again He will come. He will not come in lowliness, but in the glory of the Father, Who begets Him, in fearful authority with His holy angels in the clouds of heaven.

105. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection ; we believe in Thine ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and beg Thee, O our Lord and our God.

106. Priest : Let Thy mercy, Lord, be upon us according as we hope in Thee ⁽²⁾.

107. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (thrice)

108. Priest : Let our gathering be like the gathering of Thy disciples. Thou art theirs and Thou art ours, Thou was then as Thou art now.

109. Thine is heaven and Thine is earth; Thine are the righteous and Thine are the unrighteous, because Thou regards not thousands of sins. Thou establishes even little things to be a plant of righteousness, and Thou uses any means to save.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

110. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

111. People : As it was, is, and shall be unto generations of generations, unto unending ages.

112. At this time he shall dip his finger into the Blood and sign the Body.

Priest : Grant it together unto all them that take of it, that it may be unto them for purity and for selectivity unto them who receive of it, so that by its appearance the thorn of sin may be burnt, iniquity may be rooted out, wickedness may be destroyed and the soul may get total respite from her iniquity.

113. Let the gate of light be opened, and let the doors of glory be unlocked ⁽¹⁾, and let the living Holy Spirit be sent, descend and come from the place where He is hidden; and shine on this (pointing) bread that it may be the body of Christ our God,

The sense in this context indicates all those who are united in accepting the faith that was once delivered to all the saints as an ideal, not a commodity. Early writers, like Tertulian, used it as a hallmark indicative of unanimity in worshiping in “spirit and truth.” But that was before “denominations” occurred to anyone.

pity and mercy upon those who chose me, the poor one, to minister this mystery, unto endless ages. Amen.

117. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

118. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

119. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

120. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

121. Priest : Prayer of Fraction:

Again we beseech the Almighty and Redeemer from sin: remember that the body which Thou took from the holy Virgin is our body, and not something which Thou brought down from heaven.

122. Remember that the body which Thou took from the holy Virgin is the body which stood before Pilate.

123. Remember that the body which Thou took from the holy Virgin is the body which bore the tight bonds.

124. Remember that the body which Thou took from the holy Virgin is the body which suffered and died.

125. Remember that the body which Thou took from the holy Virgin is the body which rose from the dead on the third day.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

126. Remember that the body, which Thou took from the holy Virgin is the body which ascended into heaven in glory and sat at the right hand of the Father. Again the Lord our God will come in this body in the power of His divinity.

127. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven .

128. Priest : There is the fragrance of a sweet savour. Let our thoughts ascend to the place of this Bread that you may know the fragrance of its savour.

129. Give heed to your souls and purify your bodies and let none of us be sick through the multitude of iniquities and sins.

130. Behold, today there is with us on this table Emmanuel, the Lamb of God; and behold, there is the Father, the Light, together with His Son and the Holy Spirit.

131. Behold, there are the angels of light visiting the church. Give heed to your souls and purify your bodies and let not anyone of us be sick. There is a man of iniquity and there is a man of sin. Let us awaken our conscience that we may be worthy to take of this mystery, unto ages of ages.

132. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world, stand before the Saviour of the world, and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

ANAPHORA OF THE THREE HUNDRED

(And there are others who say instead of the previous sentence:)

The righteous fought for his sake.

133. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

134. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

135. Priest : We thank Thee, Lord, Who through Thy beloved Son Jesus Christ, has drawn us nearer before the greatness of Thine exaltation. Glory, honour and thanksgiving be to Thee, unto ages of ages. Amen.

136. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

137. Priest : Prayer of Penitence.
(Anaphora of the Apostles, 72 - 88: pp. 47, 48)

138. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

139. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

140. Then the priest shall lift up the whole Host with his hand and say : Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant, and fifteen times in a low chant).

The people shall repeat his words.

The priest shall chant them three times.

The people shall chant them twice.

141. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

142. Then the priest shall turn to the people and say : Lord our God, look upon Thy people that are penitent . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles, #95-138: pp. 49 - 53).

143. After receiving the Holy Communion,

Priest : The Prayer "Pilot of the Soul."

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was the Word of God. And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father. That Word came unto His own, and His own received Him not. (1)

144. But we, the three hundred and eighteen orthodox, received Him, we are the law-givers of the holy church whose bridegroom is the Lord our God.

Deacon : Pray ye.

145. Priest : Thou art He Whom the cherubim of many eyes and the seraphim of six wings encircle.

146. O Thou Who formed Adam in Thine image and likeness, (2) O Thou Who heaps fire upon water, O Thou Who is not darkened by darkness and art not hidden by the night : it is Thou who brought us near before this mystery. Glory, honour and thanksgiving be to Thee unto endless ages.

People : Amen.

147. Priest : "The Laying on of the Hand"

O Lord, our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, bless us and sanctify us, and make us worthy to go to our homes in tranquility and happiness without sin and without spot.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS (1)

1. The Anaphora of St. Athanasius, Patriarch of the City of Alexandria; may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King, Queen, President, . . .) unto endless ages.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.
People : And with your spirit.
Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.
People : It is right, it is just.
Priest : Lift up your hearts.
People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

3. Deacon : You who have gathered this day in this church, listen to the Anaphora of the holy Sabbath of the Christians.

4. Priest : I will cause heaven and earth to bear witness against you so that you may stand in fear and trembling, none making any disturbance.

1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. On 7th Ginbot (May 15), the memorial day of the death of St. Athanasius.
- b. On every Sunday if there is not a specific feast indicating the use of another anaphora.

(2) Athanasius, the 20th Bishop of Alexandria, was born between 296 and 298. As a lad, he attracted the attention of Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, who took him into his household and ordained him as a deacon. In his early life, before 318. When he was about twenty years old, he wrote two very important books, viz. “Contra Gentes” (Against the Heathens) and “De Incarnatione Verbi Dei.” (The Incarnation of God’s Word). It is an amazing production for one of such a young age.

In 325 he accompanied his bishop to the Council of Nicea and there he played a great part against Arius. As a deacon, he ‘was not a member of the Council, but his influence was such that the Arians soon came to recognize him as their most formidable antagonist.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

5. Let no one remain here who is angry with his brother, like the vengeful Cain.

6. Let no one remain here who is quarreling with his brother like Dathan and Abiram who quarrelled with Moses.¹

7. Let no one remain here who is deceitful towards another, like the serpent which deceived Eve.

8. O priests, you are the bright eyes of God; look to one another, investigate your people prudently in order that no adulterer, murderer, idolater, thief or liar should stand and join you in prayer, even those who are as the five dogs that are judged without.

9. Rebuke the sinner as him who is your brother, and scold him openly if he has committed a sin unto death.

10. Advise the wicked to leave that way and submit himself unto God so that He may forgive him.

In 326 he succeeded Alexander as Bishop of Alexandria. His aim in life was the highest welfare of the church, he spent most of his life in fighting against the Arians and defending the Christian faith with writings and speeches, both in Egypt and to the universal church. For this reason he was called “The Apostolic.” This stand for the truth cost him much tears and blood, because the Arians used their great influence in political changes that caused him to be exiled more than once.

It was he who consecrated Frumentius and sent him to Ethiopia in 328 as its first Archbishop during the reign of Abreha and Atsbaha, the first Christian kings of Ethiopia.

He wrote many books: some twenty remain; festal letters: forty-five survived, and personal letters: nineteen are extant.. He died on 7th Ginbot (May 15) 364: others say that he died on 2nd May 375.

11. O deacons, lights and messengers of the church, drive away from it the wolf, so that it may not be among the sheep; the kite, that it may not be among the doves, and take away the tares so that they may not be (found) among the wheat.

12. You investigate that which is without and not that which is within; but that which is within God knows and examines with His light.

13. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

14. Priest : Let the inner ears of the heart be opened and not those planted outside; let the inner eyes of the heart be uncovered and not those that are bright outside.

15. Let not our mind be like the wave of the sea which now ascends and then descends, but let it be like the pillar of fire (1) which was from earth to heaven.

16. Let our hearts be united in His fear like the golden curtain (2) which is tightly woven.

17. Let us raise our hands unto Him and stretch them to the right and to the left (3) as a sword of fire to frighten Satan as it was said.

20. Priest : Man that is in honour and understands not is like the beasts that perish (1).

21. Man, being a king, knew not, and so, at his own will, debased himself and became a servant; and those who are not lords ruled over him.

22. Man, being rich, knew not and so impoverished himself as it pleased him and let his stomach be hungry and his soul thirsty.

23. O Lord, how much Thou has done for man! Thou stretched heaven as a tent for his astonishment, and widened the earth for the tread of his feet.

24. Thou keeps water in the womb of clouds to feed him, Thou did light the sun that he might be illumined by day, Thou prepared the moon lest the darkness of night should cover him, Thou caused the light of the stars to shine upon him that he might know the work of Thy fingers, Thou gave him the days of the week, the years, the seasons and the days of the month so that he might serve Thee.

25. Oh, Thou did show the hard-hearted man death and life, but he desired death and disdained life, not the death of the body prepared for the righteous and the unrighteous, like sleep for a little while until the time, but eternal and everlasting death, the days of which are innumerable and endless.

29. O Eve, what wrong did we do you that now our body is darkened through the multitude of sins instead of being worthy to live in the likeness of the heavenly ones?

30. O Eve, what wrong did we do you that now all your daughters weep when they give birth in pain and suffering and issue blood as you made that tree in the garden to bleed?

31. O Adam and Eve, it is impossible for us to blame you as it is impossible for man to blame the tongue while speaking with it. Likewise you are one with us and we are of one kind with you.

32. O Adam and Eve, you became penitent through the reproof of the merciful Lord.

O Adam and Eve, you were truly saved and you entered into your previous inheritance through the blood of your Redeemer without hindrance.³ All the heretics who do not believe in your Redeemer are not your children though they seem to be like you.

37. Hail! Ground of Eden in which it is impossible for us to walk unless we prevent our feet from vain walking.

38. Let us also say, O seraph, guard of the garden with the sword of fire, allow us to enter and see the abode of the Lord though we may not stay in it.

39. O seraph, allow us to enter and see the abode of life though we may not hide there.

40. O seraph, allow us to enter into the garden and smell its perfume that its savour may be poured into our hearts.

41. O seraph, admit us into the previous inheritance of our father,³ that we may be pleased with its trees, though we may not pluck with our hands from its fruit as before.

As it was said, ¹ Wonderful is the movement of the sea, likewise wonderful is the movement of the rivers without noise. What shall we say: we are played like the harp which has no soul.

47. But we, who are anointed with the grace of God, true Christians, the people of Christ and Messiah, let us watch, hasten, be jealous and draw near to pass from honour to honour.

First of all let us subject our bodies, and let us always separate our minds from dissipation that the Lord our God may willingly accept our prayer.

48. Deacon : Let us give heed.

49. Priest : We have not here a proud, swelling, and crooked city which is not straight, but we have that which is above where the prophets and apostles have come before us.

holy baptism which makes us like Christ, one is the body and blood of Christ which forgive iniquity and sin, and one is the tears of penitence which flow from within like Jordan and bring us in purity before God. So let us all, being purified (1), wash our bodies with water (2).

53. And let us be like the angels who praise God with the word of holiness, according to their ranks, their congregation, their tribes, their hosts, their names and their number. There are those who cover, those who encircle, those who make a joyful noise, those who sing, those who give thanks and those who glorify. Those of six wings say, "Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts." Let us say also with them, Holy, holy, holy, God.

54. Deacon : Answer ye.

People : Holy holy holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

55. Priest : Come, let us exalt; come, let us praise; come, let us honour; come, let us celebrate the chief of the holy days which is the holy Sabbath of the Christians. Let us say, This is the day which the Lord has made; we will rejoice and be glad in it (3) ; and let us sing with Asaph, the prophet, saying Rejoice in God who helped us (4).

56. Truly let us rejoice in God Who has granted us freedom from slavery, light from darkness; make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob (5).

57. Truly let us make a joyful noise unto the God of the holy prophets and unto the Lord of the pure apostles. Take a psalm and bring hither the timbrel. (6)

58. Truly let us take the Gospel in which there are humility and love, and let us leave the Law in which there are the judgement of death and the penalty of a life for a life As the psaltery is pleasant with the harp (1) so the commandment of the Gospel is good with its fulfillment.

59. The harp is the faith with which the martyrs are clothed. Blow up the trumpet in the new moon (2)

60. Truly let us say : Halleluia in the prophet David's Psalm, at the appointed time, on our solemn feast day. (2) Truly it is that time appointed, in which God began to do His work.

61. Oh, this day is the first (3) but not the last. Oh, this day is that ultimate (4) that lasts for ever.

62. Oh, this day was declared to Abraham (5) and caused him to desire, prophesy and rejoice.

63. Oh, this day was declared to Moses on the Mount of Sinai but was hidden from the Israelites.

64. Oh, this day was known by the prophets and was hidden from the people of the Jews, but to us it has been absolutely revealed; it alternates like the sun, it rules every week and reigns every week and is numbered every week.

65. Oh, this day is what the Father hallowed, the Son blessed and the Holy Spirit exalted. Let us rejoice and be glad in it and sanctify it that we may be sanctified through it.

(1) Ps. 80 (81):2. (2) Ps. 80 (81):3. (3) The first of the seven days of creation. (4) The tradition is that Christ's second advent will be on Sunday. (5) John 8:56. (3), (4), (5) In its relation to the Seventh, it is also reckoned as the apocalyptic "Eighth Day." See the inscriptions of Septuagint Psalms 6, 11, 23; Ezek. 43:27.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

66. O other days of the week, which are introduced through it to the seasons and to the days of the month, come ye, let us praise the holy Sabbath of the Christians which is the chief of the holy days.

67. Oh, this day is that in which the old ceased and the new was confirmed; Oh, this day is that in which the prisoners were released and the slaves were set free. (1)

68. Oh, this day is that on which the ruined was rebuilt and Satan was destroyed.

69. Again, when this day rules there will be a new work and a new thing; and at that time there will not be the light of the sun or the moon or the stars or candle or any light, winter or summer.

70. The earth will rest for seven days while there will not be in it any moving thing of all the living creatures. There will be sent a sounding word; through the same word the existing heaven will be destroyed and the earth will pass away.

71. At that time the graves will be opened and the dead that waxed old from the beginning of the world will rise in the twinkling of an eye. The Father will grant to His Son the kingdom and the judgement, then there will be revealed the power of a new lightning and a fearful sound of thunder which ear has not heard and eye has not seen from the beginning.

72. There will stand before Him the fearful angels with the wings of fire who have no names, and whom they do not call such and such a one, and who lived within the veil of the Father, and they are the messengers of His face. Their wings will strike one against another,' they will sound,

(1) On the Lord's resurrection day. See also notes 3, 4, 5 in the previous column.

thunder and draw out their swords and let them glitter to show their strength.

73. At that time the sea of fire will be opened to its very depth and the pit of frost which is under it will be opened also; the river of fire will flood that every one may see that which waits for him.

74. At that time the books will be opened, the works will be revealed, the tongue will keep silent, the talkative mouth will be dumb, and all the creatures will stand in fear and tremble and there will be a great silence; and upon the whole earth there will not be a space as wide as a foot's span, and they will be thronged like the seeds in a pomegranate.

75. At that time there will neither be short nor tall, neither black nor red, but one body and one appearance.

76. At that time there will not be a ransom of the soul, neither will man be judged for his wife, nor the father for his son, nor the mother for her daughter, but everyone will take the recompense of his work.

77. He will not be afraid of the rich because of his wealth but as it was accounted to him; he will not pity the poor because of his poverty unless he is pleased with him.

78. At that time the righteous will rejoice because they mourned in their life, the sinners will weep because they loved laughter and mirth and because the day of recompense and condemnation will fall upon them.

79. At that time the rich will become poor because they fulfilled their pleasure unrighteously, and the poor will become rich because they accepted their poverty with thankfulness.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

80. At that time the hungry will be satisfied because they suffered in their lives.

81. At that time the speakers will keep silent because they spoke vain and worthless (words). But the patient will speak because they did not let their tongue run to backbiting and did not sadden their neighbour at all.

82. At that time the strong will become weak because they destroyed their bodies in fornication, and the weak will become strong because they weakened their strength in prostration and watchfulness day and night.

83. At that time the hands of the powerful will become withered because they stretched their hands to steal and caused the widow and the orphan to weep.

84. At that time the rejected will fly like eagles, their wings will burgeon and their strength will be renewed.

85. At that time the haughty and the proud will be uncovered and their nakedness will be revealed.

86. At that time the naked will be clothed because the showers of rain and the dew wet them and they suffered from cold and frost, and the heat of the sun burnt them.

87. At that time there will be neither spear nor shield, neither bow nor arrow, because everything on earth will pass away.

88. At that time the King will judge a right judgement, which has no respect of persons.

89. At that time the sinners will be separated from the righteous, and the unclean from the clean.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

90. How great will be the shout of that time, how great will be the cry of that time, and how much will be the tears of that time when the Creator will weep for His creatures formed with His hand, when He will see them going in the way of destruction.

91. At that time the sinners will weep for themselves, the righteous will weep for their relatives and the angels of heaven will be sad for the creation of man.

92. The assistant priest shall now go round the altar carrying the censer.

93. Priest : At that time when all is fulfilled there will be pitched a tent of light for His elect and His righteous and there will be stretched a curtain of fire of seven divisions for them.

94. There will enter the High Priest (1) Jesus Christ into the mystery and He will have the priests stand at His right hand and the deacons at His left hand to show them the order of the mystery.

95. What will the mystery of that time look like, what will be its name and what will be said of it? Today, it is impossible for them to speak about it, and to conceive: it is not in the heart of mortal man.

96. O ordained priests, (1) honour is yours as you minister with the Lord of heaven and earth.

(1) At least, paragraphs 45-104 present a lesson that includes imagery like the Revelation (Apocalypse of St. John the Evangelist). It is the Apostolic understanding of the church which sees Jesus Christ as that High Priest, fulfilling all Old Testament types, and as the Creator making all things New. He expects His people to perpetuate on earth what He commanded in remembrance of Him (Lk. 22:19): to offer the same sacrifice that He eternally offers on our behalf in the Kingdom. He respects our free will. We may choose to participate, or we may, just observe, or absent ourselves. See Gen. 14:18; 31:54; Lev. 21:10; Ps. 109:4; Heb. 2:17; 3:1; 4:14-6:20; 8:1; 9:11; 1Pt 2:5.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

97. O chosen deacons who resemble a pure spring of gold, joy is yours when you behold the wonderful mystery.

98. O holy fathers who resemble the pure golden pillars standing on the sapphire stones, you will qualify to be called blessed.

99. O all believers, resembling the bright stars, greatness will be yours as you enter into that wedding, the marriage of Christ, greatness will be yours when you see your God girded and walking with you and giving you His gifts.

100. At that time pray and intercede on our behalf, that He may have compassion and mercy upon us: not according to our merit but according to your merit, not according to our evil deeds but according to the mercy of our God.

101. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (Thrice)

102. Priest : We pray Thee, Lord, and beseech Thee on behalf of our fathers and brothers who have fallen asleep and departed from this corruptible world, grant them to rest well because there is no one pure before Thee from filthiness, since man is the mire of sin.

103. If Thou, Lord, should mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand before Thee. (1)

104. Today on this day the Sabbath of light, in which Thy body and blood are prepared, we remember those whose names we know through the word of this deacon, and remember Thou through Thy mercy those whose names we do not know. Write their names in the book of life in free Jerusalem. (2)

(1) Ps. 129 (130):3. (2) Phil. 4:3; Rev. 20:12-21:3; Rev. 22:19. The qedasi is our participation in a foretaste of the eternal kingdom of God. Christ's eternal intercession on our behalf breaks through into time, every time we celebrate it in remembrance of Him.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

105. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed (Anaphora of the Apostles #6-9: p. 43).

106. Asst. Priest : Prayer of Benediction. (Anaphora of the Apostles # 10-21: p. 43, 44)

107. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

108. Priest : Before this, Thine Anaphora, there are glory, thanksgiving, greatness and exaltation. Jesus Christ the Son of the living God, Thy greatness is inestimable, Thy kingdom is endless. Thy government is unlimited, and Thy rule is boundless.

109. It is not known whence Thy divinity proceeds, and where Thine existence lites; it is not understood whence Thy divinity floods, and where Thy nature is described.

110. The mind of man cannot reach Thy beginning, and the speed of angels cannot find Thine end. Thou art invisible to the eyes of all, and Thou art heard by the ears of all.

111. Thou art far and high from the eyes of all, and Thou art near all those who fear Thee, Thou rests with them and fulfills their will.

112. O Thou Who desires not the death of the sinner but his return.¹

113. O Thou Who lets the infant proceed from the loins of man and sends it to the womb of woman and wraps it with a very thin covering, and congeals it through Thy wisdom while it is liquid, and breathes upon it the Spirit of life, and on the fortieth day Thou predisposes it either for riches or poverty, justification or destruction:

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

114. Thence, also, Thou delivers it, opens its throat to cry, and moves its hands and feet to discover the breast of its mother:

115. O Thou Who lets it grow, mature and reach old age: it either for riches or poverty, justification or destruction.

116. O Thou Who lets the wind sound without being seen, and makes the mist move without sound:

117. O Thou Who hat the treasury of glory which all glories cannot fill:

118. Who, like Thee, has covered His throne with fire, has drawn the picture of water in his garments who, like Thee, has weighed the mountains with balances and measured the sea water in the hollow of His hand? (1)

119. Who, like Thee, lays the beams of His chambers in the water (2) makes His surrounding walls of fire? Neither the upper firmament of water descends to the surrounding walls of fire through Thy wisdom, nor the lower surrounding walls ascend to the firmament of water of Thine existence.

120. This is a wonderful, admirable and marvellous thing. Of which shall I think and about which shall I marvel? Of Thine existence with Thy Father in silence and holiness? Or of Thine infancy in the bosom of Thy mother like other babies?

121. Of what shall I think and about which shall I marvel? Of the glory sent to Thee by the seraphim like the waves of the sea? Or of Thy standing in humility in Jordan?

122. O Lord, while Thou art above, Thou only art also beneath, and while Thou art beneath, Thou art above in Trinity.

123. We spoke, as much as we could, even unto heaven,

(1) Is. 40:12. (2) Ps. 104:3.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

but we could not pass beyond that, because there is the sea of fire which would not let our mind go any further. Thou Thyself knows Thy nature, and Thou Thyself understands Thy divinity.

At this time he shall cense. (Anaphora of the Apostles #35: p. 45).

124. People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom.... (Anaphora of the Apostles #34, p. 45).

125. Priest : This (pointing) bread, even Thy body, we offer unto Thee. And this (pointing) cup, even Thy blood, we offer unto Thee. Because of our sin and iniquity and because of the folly of Thy people, Thou did not hide the mystery of Thy divinity's greatness from Thy disciples.

126. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

127. Priest : Thou took bread before them. (At this time he shall raise the bread).

128. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

129. Priest : Thou gave thanks, blessed, (+ three times) and broke.

130. Then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

And Thou did give it to them saying, "Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body" which does not differ from it.

131. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God; that this is He we truly believe.

132. Priest : And likewise also the cup : mixing water with wine therein, Thou gave thanks, blessed, and hallowed (+ three times) and Thou gave it them saying, "Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood," which does not differ from it.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

He shall move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

133. Priest : As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup proclaim My death and My and believe in My ascension into heaven, hoping for My second advent in glory.

People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection.

134. Priest : As Thou did not hide from Thy disciples the mystery of Thy divinity's greatness, they also did not hide anything from us, and they ordained us patriarchs, bishops, priests and deacons to serve Thy church.

135. Cut off from the earth the remembrance (1) of all who reject our law, and do not write their names in the book of life.

136. Hang chains of fire round the necks of all those who do not agree with the congregation of the apostles in the holy church, that they may be drawn by them into great sorrow.

137. Draw out Thy sword and stop the way against all of them that hate Thy holy name, and let the earth which they tread be a slough and swallow them up that they may go down alive into hell (2).

138. And keep us through Thy mercy, we that are persecuted for Thy name, and have been plundered by the heretics, that we may strengthen the hearts of Thy believers.

139. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

(1) Ps. 33 (34):16. (2) Ps. 54 (55):15.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

140. Priest : Because the cunning opposition who pity not Thy flock have multiplied.

141. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

142. People: As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, unto the ages of ages.

143. At this time he shall dip his finger into the Blood and sign the Body.

Priest : Grant it together unto all of them, hallowing one through another. ¹ (+ once over the bread, once over the cup, and once more over both.)

144. O Son, cry as a sufferer and say, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani ; and while it is in their mouth say, Abba, My Father, have compassion and mercy on those who eat My body and drink My blood.

145. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

146. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

¹ i.e. grant them Thy body joined with Thy blood, and Thy blood joined with Thy body; hallowing Thy body with Thy blood, and Thy blood with Thy body.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

147. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

148. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

149. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Again we supplicate the God of mercy and minister to Him Who is Himself the minister; we sacrifice to Him Who is Himself the sacrifice, and offer to Him Who is Himself the offering.

150. Let that Lamb come from the highest that we may see Him with our eyes, immolate Him with our hands, and rejoice in Him.

151. May His body be joined with this bread and may His blood be poured into this cup.

152. Let none of us think when he eats of this bread that he eats mere flesh without blood and Spirit. Let none of us think when he drinks of this cup that he drinks mere blood without body and Spirit ; but one is the Body, Blood and Spirit,

153. as the divinity of the Lord our God became one with His humanity. ¹

154. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven. .

. (see Anaphora #2 : 69 on p. 62)

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

155. Priest : We pray Thee, O Father, and beseech Thy kindness to send Thy beloved Son Whose nature cannot be traced, being the fire of the godhead.

156. Therefore let us see Him who resembles fire in the spiritual rite of His death, of His death which speaks. May Jesus Christ be joined with this sacrifice, unto ages of ages.

157. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world, stand before the Saviour of the world, and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

158. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

159. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

160. Priest : O this day, the holy Sabbath of Christians, you are glorious like the Father, ruling like the Son, and living like the Holy Spirit. O this day, the holy Sabbath of the Christians, offer prayer and supplication towards the Lord our God on behalf of us, unto the ages of ages.

161. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

162. Priest : Prayer of Penitence. (Anaphora of the Apostles #72-88: pp. 47, 48).

163. Deacon: Give heed.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

164. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

165. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hand and say:

Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant, and fifteen time: in a low chant).

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall chant them three times, and the people twice.

166. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

167. Then the priest shall turn to the people and say:

Priest : Lord our God, look upon those who are penitent.

168. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : Pilot of the Soul.

As David said in the Psalms Lord, who shall abide in Thy tabernacle? who shall dwell on the hill of Thy sanctuary?

169. Then the Holy Spirit answered and said : He that walks uprightly, and works righteousness, and speaks the truth in his heart. He that does not gossip with his tongue nor does evil to his neighbour, nor takes up a reproach against his neighbour. In whose eyes a vile person is disregarded ; but he honours them that fear the Lord. He that promises his neighbour and does not lie. He that puts not out his money to usury, nor takes a bribe against the innocent. He that does these things shall never be moved (1).”

(1) Ps. 14 (15).

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

170. Again he said Who shall ascend into the mount of the Lord? Or who shall stand in the place of His sanctuary?¹

171. Then the Holy Spirit answered and said “He that has a pure heart and clean hands ; who has not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn to his neighbour deceitfully. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord,”² and he shall enter the city whose builder and maker is the Lord our God.

Deacon : Pray ye.

172. Priest : Come, let us exalt; come, let us praise; come, let us honour; come, let us celebrate the chief of the holy days which is the holy Sabbath of the Christians.

173. As we rejoiced yesterday at its entrance so also let us bid it fare well rejoicing still as it departs, observing it for our body’s rest.

174. And our rest is not to sleep like a suffering one in his disease, but to watch day and night that we may cherish this day.

175. Again let us say, Pray for us and intercede towards the Lord our God for us who have become like animals and even have done evil more than them.

² Ps. 23 (24):3-5.

ANAPHORA OF ST. ATHANASIUS

176. O holy one, come unto us every week that we may rejoice in Thee, unto the endless ages.

People : Amen.

177. “The Laying on of the Hand”

Priest : He called them, “my priests,” and loved them more than all. That which was not done to the angels has been done to the priests.¹

178. O Lord our God and our Father who art in heaven, grant that the holy body of Thy Son and the precious blood of Thy Messiah, which we have received at the hands of the priests, may be for life, salvation, remission of sin and everlasting life, unto the ages of ages. Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL ⁽¹⁾

1. The Anaphora of St. Basil (2), may his prayer and blessing be with our (Head of state : King, queen, president . . .) unto endless ages. Amen.

2. Priest : Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ.
Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ.
Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ.

The people shall repeat his words.

3. Deacon : Jesus Christ, Son of God, hear us and pity us.

Rise and stand in awe. Look to the east. Stand well. Stand watchfully. Stand in the fear of God. Draw near in humility. Stand in awe. Look to the east. Answer ye.

4. People : Mercy, peace, and sacrifice of praise. (to be repeated thrice)

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. 6th Ter (January 14), the memorial day of the death of St. Basil.
- b. On the memorial days of bishops, priests, and kings.
- c. Sometimes every day.

(2) St. Basil, known as Basil the Great, Bishop of Caesarea, came of a famous family which gave a number of distinguished supporters to the church. His sister, Macrina, was celebrated for her saintly life; his second brother was the famous Gregory of Nyssa; his youngest was Peter, Bishop of Sebaste; and his eldest brother was the famous Christian jurist Naucratus. Basil was born about 330 at Caesarea in Cappadocia. Eager to learn, he went to Constantinople and spent four or five years there and at Athens. It was at Athens that he seriously began to think of religion, and resolved to seek out the most famous hermit saints in Syria and Arabia.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

5. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

6. Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People :

Truly it is right, righteousness is His.

Truly it is right, righteousness is due Him.

Truly it is right, righteousness due unto Him.

7. Priest : O living Master, Lord our God, Who in truth was before the world was created, who reigns for ever and art in the highest and beholds the humble

8. The Creator of heaven, earth, sea, and all things that are in them, Father of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, by Whom Thou made all, visible and invisible, Who sits upon the holy throne of His glory,

After that we find him at the head of a convent near Arnesi in Pontus. In 365 was ordained priest. In 370 Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, died, and Basil was chosen to succeed him. It was there that his powers were activated. He powerfully applied his talents against the Arians who were numerous in that part of the country and were favoured by the Arian Emperor Valens. He died on 5th of Ter (January 13) 379.

It is said, according to the Ethiopian Church's tradition, that he collected the Anaphoras of: The Apostles, The Three Hundred, and Athanasius.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

to whom the powers (1) prostrate themselves in purity:

9. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, arise.

10. Priest : And before Whom do stand the angels, the archangels, the angels, the thrones, the authorities, the dominions and all the powers.

11. Deacon : Look to the east.

12. Priest : It is Thou Whom the cherubim, full of eyes, and the seraphim with six wings, encircle.

13. Deacon : Let us give heed.

14. Priest : They praise Thee without ceasing saying :

15. Deacon : Answer ye.

16. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

17. Priest : Holy, holy, holy art Thou, Lord our God and our Creator, Who put us in the garden of delight.

18. And when we committed iniquity and transgressed through the guile of the serpent. We fell far from eternal life and were cast out of the garden of delight.

19. Thou did not leave us for ever but visited us by Thy holy prophets. And in the end of days Thou appeared unto us who were sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death.

And Thou caused to shine upon us the light of Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord and God Jesus Christ, Who was made man from the Holy Spirit and from the Holy Virgin Mary.

People : Amen. We believe.

(1) i.e. Angels.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

20. Priest : He took flesh and was made man and taught us the path of salvation and granted us the birth from on high, of water and of the Holy Spirit.

People : Amen. We believe.

21. Priest : And He made us unto Himself a pure people, and purified us by the Holy Spirit, because He loved His own who are in this world, and gave Himself up by His will to deliver us from the death which reigned over us.

22. By reason of it we were bound and sold through our sins. He descended into hell from the cross.

People : Amen. We believe.

23. Priest : And He rose from the dead on the third day, and ascended in glory unto heaven, and sat down at Thy right hand, O Father. He has appointed a day of retribution wherein He will appear to judge the world in righteousness and give everyone according to his works.

24. People : According to Thy mercy, Lord, and not according to our sins. (to be chanted thrice)

25. The assistant priest shall go round the ark and bring the censer to the priest who shall cense.

26. People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom. (Anaphora of the Apostles #34: p. 45).

27. Priest : He left unto us this great mystery of godliness being willing to give His soul up unto death for the life of all the world.

28. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

29. Priest : He took bread into His holy, pure, spotless, blessed and life-giving hands.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

At this time he shall raise the bread.

30. People : Amen. We believe. Again we believe that this is He; truly we believe.

31. Priest : He looked up to heaven, O God, towards Thee, His Father, and the Lord of all Who is above all.

32. He gave thanks, blessed (+ three times). Then he shall indent the Host slightly with his thumb in five places without separation) and broke, and gave it to his holy disciples and to his pure apostles saying unto them, "Take, eat ye all of it, this (pointing) bread is my body which will be broken on behalf of you for the remission of sin, and thus do in remembrance of Me.

33. People : Amen. We believe. Amen. Amen. Amen. Again, we believe and confess, we glorify thee, O our Lord and our God. That this is He, we truly believe.

34. Priest : And likewise also the cup after mixing in it water and wine, He gave thanks, blessed, (+ three times) hallowed, tasted, and gave it to His holy disciples and pure apostles and said unto them, "Take, drink ye all of it, this (pointing) cup is my blood which will be shed on your behalf for the remission of sin."

He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

35. People: Amen. We believe again. Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe.

36. Priest : Thus, as often as ye eat of this bread and drink of this cup do it in remembrance of Me, proclaim My death and believe in My resurrection until I come.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

37. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and thy holy resurrection.

38. Priest : We make memorial also of His holy sufferings and His resurrection from the dead and His ascension unto heaven and His sitting on Thy right hand, O Father, and His second manifestation_ when He shall come bringing great fear_ which is full of glory. We offer unto Thee this offering which becomes Thee in all things, and for all things.

39. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

40. Priest : (in a low voice) We beseech Thee, O Lord our God, we, Thy sinful and unworthy servants, and worship Thee by the pleasure of Thy Father, that Thou may send Thy Holy Spirit upon this offering, which is offered before Thee, to purify it and to sanctify us with Thy holy things.

41. May He make this (pointing) bread the body of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, (+ three times) in order that it may be given for the remission of sin and eternal life unto them who take thereof.

People : Amen. We believe.

42. Priest : And also make this (pointing) cup the precious blood of our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ (+ three times) that it may be given for the remission of sin and eternal life unto them who take thereof (+ over both).

43. People : Amen, we believe again amen, Lord have pity upon us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

44. Priest : Make us worthy to take of Thy holy things in purity of our soul and our body and our spirit, that we may be one body and one spirit and find a portion and inheritance with all Thy saints whom Thou did choose.

45. Remember, Lord, the peace of the one holy apostolic church.

46. Deacon : For the peace of the one holy apostolic church which is right with God.

47. Priest : That which Thou has purchased with the glorious blood of Thy Christ. Keep in peace, with all the orthodox bishops, priests and deacons who are in her.

48. First remember, Lord, the honourable father, the Patriarch Abba (_____), and our blessed Archbishop Abba (_____) and those who, with them, rightly divide the word of truth.

Deacon : Pray for the Patriarch Abba (_____) and our blessed Archbishop Abba (_____) and all the orthodox bishops.

49. Priest : Keep them for Thy holy church to feed Thy flock in righteousness and peace. Remember, Lord, the orthodox priests and deacons.

50. Deacon : Pray for the orthodox priests, deacons, assistant deacons, and all those who are in this service, and all those who are in virginity and purity, and remember, Lord, all thy faithful people, and have mercy upon us all.

51. People : Have mercy upon us, O God, Father almighty.

52. Priest : Remember, Lord, the salvation of this holy place which is Thine.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

53. Deacon : Pray for the salvation of this place and the salvation of the world.

54. Priest : and this city and all the cities, villages, islands, places and monasteries which are in true faith and all those who dwell in them.

55. People : Lord have mercy upon us, Lord have mercy upon us, Lord have mercy upon us.

56. Priest : and this city and all the churches of our orthodox fathers and those who dwell in them in the faith of God.

57. Give graciously, Lord, rain and suitable weather and the fruit of the earth and bless the herbs.

58. Deacon : Pray for the rain, the wind of the sky, the fruit of the earth, seed, plants, the fruit of the trees and for the vineyards, and for every fruitful tree in all the world, that Christ our God will bring them into perfection in safety and peace and forgive us our sins.

59. People : Lord have mercy upon us, Lord have mercy upon us, Lord have mercy upon us.

60. Priest : Bring them up according to their measure that they may grow and prosper through Thy grace. Make Thou the face of the earth, to rejoice, water her furrows, let her grain be abundantly multiplied and make ready her planting and harvest,

61. and govern our life as is best for us, bless the crown of the year with Thy goodness, for the sake of the poor of Thy people, for the sake of the widows and the orphans, and for the sake of the strangers and the wanderers, and for the sake of us all who hope in Thee and who call Thy holy and glorious name, because the eyes of all hope in Thee, that Thou will give them their meat in its good season. Deal with us according to Thy mercy.

62. O Thou who gives meat unto all flesh, fill our hearts with joy and gladness, give us our sufficiency in all things at all times that we may abound in every good work.

63. People : Lord have mercy upon us
Lord have mercy upon Lord have mercy upon us.

64. Priest : Remember, Lord, the ruler of this land, Thy servant (_____).

65. Deacon : Pray that God may grant us compassion and mercy before the court of the great rulers that He soften their hearts towards us unto good, and grant salvation and victory unto our ruler and forgive us our sins.

66. Keep him for us in righteousness and peace, give him many years, strengthen his kingdom, keep his army, give him power, strength and victory over those who would sow dissension on his frontiers.

67. And speak in his heart for the sake of Thy churches, and grant that we may live in rest and quietness and be found worthy to keep thy commandments in all godliness which is Thine.

68. Remember, Lord, them who have brought Thee this offering and them on whose behalf they have offered it.

69. Deacon : Pray for this our sacrifice and the oblation of our holy communion.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

70. Priest : and those who offered from that which they have. Grant them all the heavenly reward because this is the commandment of Thine only-begotten Son that we should remember Thy saints who pleased Thee from the beginning

71. Our fathers the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, the prophets, the apostles, the martyrs, the faithful, those who preached the gospel in the church and all the souls of the righteous perfect in faith.

72. And especially, the always grace-filled, holy, pure, mother of God, Virgin Mary.

85. Priest shall say secretly : Remember also, Lord, all those who have fallen asleep and rested in the right faith, the clergy in the office of priesthood, and all the congregation of the laity.

86. And again grant rest to the souls of them all in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and place them in the green place where there is water of refreshment, in the garden of delight, the place whence soreness of heart and sorrow and sighing have fled away, in the light of Thy saints.

87. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles #6 - 9: p. 43).

88. The assistant priest shall say the Prayer of Benediction of Gregory. (Anaphora of St. Gregory #56 - 59: pp. 123 - 124).

Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons, and all the Christian people.

89. Priest : Abba Antony, Abba Macarius, Abba Paule', Abba Macari, Abba Yohannes, Abba Beshoi, Abba Isdros,

90. and our Roman fathers Maximos and Domatios, Abba Moses, Abba Daniel, Abba Barsoma, Abba Abounafar, Abba Pachomius, Abba Shenouda, Abba Babnouda,

91. and all those who taught rightly and established the true word, the orthodox bishops, priests, deacons, clergy, laity, all these.

92. Deacon : Pray for our fathers and our brothers who have fallen asleep and rested in the faith of Christ since the creation of the world.

93. Priest : Our holy fathers the patriarchs, our fathers the bishops, our fathers the bishops of villages, our fathers the priests, our brothers the deacons, our fathers the monks, and our brothers the laity,

94. and for all the Christian people who have rested, that Christ our Lord may grant rest to the souls of them all in the bosom of our righteous fathers Abraham, Isaac and

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

Jacob, in the garden of delight. May He also grant mercy unto us and forgive us our sins.

95. Deacon : Pray ye for the sorrowful.

96. People : O Lord have compassion upon them, O Lord have mercy upon them, O Lord rest them. Amen.

97. Priest : O Lord, rest the souls of these who are in this place. And us also, who are pilgrims in this place, do Thou keep in Thy faith, here and in every place; and grant us always Thy peace and save us unto the end of our days, and lead us unto Thy everlasting kingdom.

98. People : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

99. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, unto endless ages.

100. Priest : That as in this place, so also at all times Thy great and holy name may be glorified, extolled and blessed, which is in all things glorious and blessed together with Thy beloved Son Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit, unto the ages of ages.

101. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

102. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

103. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord, have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

104. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Again we give thanks unto God almighty the Father of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, because He has made us worthy even now to stand in this holy and pure place and lift up our hands and minister unto His holy Name.

105. Let us also entreat the almighty Lord our God that He make us worthy even of the communion and participation of His divine and undying mysteries, the holy body and the precious blood of His Christ,

106. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven . .

(see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

107. Priest : Master, Lord, Lord our God, for ever great, Thou art He Whose honourable glory is wonderful, Who keeps His covenant and mercy with those who love Him from their whole hearts,

108. Who granted us salvation from our sins through His only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, the life of all, the helper of those who flee to Him, and the hope of those who cry unto Him,

109. before Whom stand a thousand of thousands and ten thousand of ten thousands of holy angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim and all the countless congregation of heavenly powers.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. BASIL

110. O God, who has sanctified this offering, which has been prepared before Thee, through the descent of the Holy Spirit upon it, cleanse us, O Master, from all our sins, hidden and open.

111. And let every thought which displeases Thy goodness, O God, lover of man, be far from us. Cleanse our souls, bodies, spirits and hearts, that we may, with pure heart and enlightened soul and rejoicing lips, dare to call upon Thee without fear, O holy Father, saying : Our Father who art in heaven . . .

112. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world. Let us draw nigh the face of the Saviour of the world. In that faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

113. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

114. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

115. Behold, with us today, at this table is Emmanuel, the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world, giver of His word through the thrones (1),

116. all the hosts of angels who stand before Him cry and bless Him, and archangels bow and worship Him Who has a great Name which is invisible.

117. The four praising and singing beasts who carry His throne cry and bless Him, and the twenty-four priests, carrying in their hands golden censers (1) full of incense which is the prayer of the pure, offer it upward as an acceptable sacrifice before the living One for ever.

118. The hundred and forty four thousand pure virgins who washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb praise and bless the Lord of hosts saying (2)

Amen. Halleluia. Holy Father, Lord of hosts, Amen.

Halleluia. Holy, only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, Amen.

Halleluia. Holy, Holy Spirit, the comforter Paraclete, Amen.

Halleluia. Holy and chosen Virgin Mary, mother of God, Amen.

Halleluia. This pure sacrifice is also chosen. Amen. Halleluia.

119. For this reason our Saviour exclaimed that My flesh is indeed the meat of righteousness and My blood is indeed the drink of life; he that eats My flesh and drinks My blood dwells in Me, and I also dwell in him, (3)

120. that we may, with pure heart and rejoicing lips, graciously dare to say, O holy God the Father, Our Father who art in heaven . . .

(see Anaphora #2:69 : p. 62)

121. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

122. People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship and Thee do we glorify.

123. Priest : Prayer of Penitence. (Anaphora of the Apostles #72 - 88: p. 46 - 48).

124. Deacon : Give heed.

125. Priest : Holy things for the holy.

126. People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

127. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

128. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hand and say:

Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant.)

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

129. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

130. Then the priest shall turn to the people and say :

Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles 95-96 again 96-138: pp. 45 - 53)

131. After receiving the Holy Communion:

Pilot of the Soul

Then was our mouth filled with laughter and our tongue with singing (1), we who have received this indestructible mystery.

132. O Lord, that which eye hath not seen nor ear heard neither has it entered into the heart of man, thou hast prepared, O God, for them that love Thy holy Name, (2) even so Father for so it seemed good in Thy sight because Thou art compassionate, O Lord our God.

134. Deacon : Pray ye.

135. Priest : And to Thee we send, unto the highest heaven, glory and honour, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. (1)

People : Amen.

136. Priest : “The Laying on of the Hand”

Dwell, Lord, in these Thy servants who serve Thee and call upon Thy holy Name, and who have bowed their heads before Thee, even walk with them, and help them in every good work, and purify their hearts from every evil earthly deed,

137. and grant them to live and think of the eternal life and understand that which pleases Thee, through Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ unto Whom we all cry and say, Have mercy upon us, Lord our Saviour, unto endless ages. Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY ⁽¹⁾

1. Deacon : Pray for our fathers the archbishops and bishops, our fathers the priests, our brothers the deacons. Pray, O ye children of this church, for the faithful men and women. Again pray for the virgins and the husbandless, for the aged and infants, for children and adults. Stand up well, stand up, that the peace of God may be with you.

2. Anaphora of Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa (2) and brother of Basil : may his prayer and blessing be with our (Head of state : King, Queen, President . . .) unto the ages of ages. Amen.

3. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

a. On five days in Lent, from the Wednesday before Palm Sunday until Palm Sunday.

b. On 21st Ter (January 29), the memorial day of the death of St. Gregory.

(2) He was a younger brother of St. Basil the Great, Bishop of Caesarea, and was born at NeoCaesarea about 331 A.D. At an early age he entered the church, and held for some time the office of anagnost or reader. In 371, he was ordained by his brother Basil to the Bishopric of Nyssa, a small town in Cappadocia. At the great ecumenical council held at Constantinople, in 381, he was a conspicuous champion of the orthodox faith. The exact date of his death is unknown; some authorities refer it to 396, others to 400. His festival is observed on 21st Ter (January 29).

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

4. Priest : We give thanks unto our Benefactor, the merciful God, Father of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ.

5. We give thanks unto Thee, holy God, compassionate God and merciful God, slow to anger, plenteous in mercy, righteous. Thou art our God, without beginning, and our Saviour without end.

6. His right hand is fire and the authority of His word is indestructible, the length of His years is uncountable, and there are no bounds to the range of His government.

7. He has no respect of persons, neither does He turn aside His face from giving an answer; He does not reverence the rich because of his riches, He does not send the poor away because of his poverty.

8. Because Thou sees the hidden from the beginning, looks upon everything until the last breath.

9. Deacon : Let us look at the beauty of our God's glory.

10. Priest : This is He who made heaven, and this is He who built the earth. His divinity is unfathomable, has neither height nor depth, neither length nor width, neither right nor left, no centre, but it fills all the ends of the world.

11. He is hidden from the minds of all the angels, none can know his nature and none can count that which he formed with his hand.

12. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

13. Priest : He came from above the heavens, His firmament, was incarnated, taking our nature, and was made man, taking the body of His first creature, he descended without being emptied of the joy of His divinity, and has quickened us through His death.

14. Deacon : Look to the east.

15. Priest : We lift up the eyes of our heart to thee, and bow our stubborn hearts to Thee. Submission be to Thee, glory to Thy kingdom ; and we offer unto Thee pure incense together with Thine archangels.

At this time he shall raise incense.

16. People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom (Anaphora of the Apostles #34: p.45)

17. Priest : We stretch out our hands to Thee and overshadow this (pointing) sacrifice.

18. He suffered by His will, was pleased to be crucified, died through the counsel of His Father, rose on the third day, ascended in glory into heaven, His beauty covered heaven, and His glory filled the earth.

19. Deacon : Answer ye.

20. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

21. Priest : (in a low voice) O my Lord, Master, Who has fellowship with the first and the last, (1) Thou art the living bread which came down from heaven. Send the Holy Spirit and power on this bread and on this cup which sanctify our souls, bodies and spirits, that we may be purified, through Him, from all our sins, and that we may draw near to take Thy holy mystery, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, and worship, unto endless ages.

22. Priest : (in a loud chant) O eternal God, Thou art the beginning and the ending, the beginning without a morrow, and the ending without a previous day, full of years without a today.

23. He binds up the waters in clouds ¹, and lets rain go down from their womb; He takes it up into heaven and lets rain descend for the nutrition of all creatures, He does according to His design and fulfills according to His will. There are among Us² three persons who hold all the world with one counsel, with one authority and with one unity.

25. Together with Thy Father Thou made heaven. There is none compassionate like Thee and there is none whose word is with such authority who is patient like Thee.

26. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (to be chanted thrice)

27. Priest : He is more terrible than the terrible, ³ higher than the high,³ and stronger than the peaks of the mountains.

28. Glorious is He Who sits in the highest heaven, profound is He Who sits beneath the depths, His chariot is snow and the bounds of its circle are fenced with fire

29. Its centre is full of smoke. None enters and none goes out except those creatures of terrible appearance and with six wings, whose bodies are full of eyes.

30. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

³ i.e. the angels.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

31. Priest : He took bread on his nailed hands which formed our father Adam. He is pure without sin, and absolutely pure without deceit. (At this time he shall raise the bread)

32. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

33. Priest : He gave thanks, blessed (+ three times) and broke.

Then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

And gave it to His disciples and said to them, Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body, which is indeed the food of righteousness, and which is given for the salvation of all the world. He who will eat it shall live for ever.

34. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God ; that this is He, we truly believe.

35. Priest: He also looked upon this (pointing) cup, the water of life with wine, gave thanks, blessed (+ three times), sanctified, gave it to His apostles and said unto them, Take, drink; this cup is My blood which is the drink of life indeed. He who drinks of it will have eternal life. Take, drink of it, all of you, that it may be to you for life and salvation

He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

36. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

Priest : (Take, drink,) ye who have gathered in this house of prayer where all the faithful men and women pray.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

37. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection ; we believe Thy ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee, and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

38. Priest : In the beginning was the Word, and that Word was the Word of God, and that Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and His flesh hid Him from us.

39. He put on mortal flesh and made it immortal, and through this flesh, God who can never be scourged, was scourged.

40. Ye who are willing to partake of the suffering of your neighbours and to take upon yourselves the sufferings of your beloved ones, come to see this scourge. It is astonishing to him who looks at it with his eyes, and amazing to him who listens to it with his ears. Come ye to see the smiting on the cheeks by a servant and the beating on the head with sticks in the court of the chief priests.

41. Come ye to see the crown of thorns with which they crowned the giver of life to all.

42. Come to kneel to Him only all ye the hosts of angels who fly above the air and who are sent towards the sun, the moon and the stars and who ascend towards the seas and lakes. (1)

43. The sea trembled and the waters of the stream fled when they saw God beaten on his cheeks; the sun was darkened, the moon became blood and the stars became void of their great light.

44. Death was afraid, the Devil fell, and Hades went together with its own to receive the terrible God.

(1) i.e. the waters above the firmament.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

45. Come ye to see the wonderful thing which was done in the house of prayer when the high priest entered within the veil of which all said that it was the dwelling place of the Deity and the concealing of all thoughts. The Lord of lords and spirits entered therein riding upon the lowly colt of an ass.

46. He revealed His divinity to all the infants who said, Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord, and blessed art thou, Lord, God of gods, and King of Israel.

47. He showed His disciples the manner of going around with the Hosanna; and the Blessed said unto them, Say, crying with a loud voice, Hosanna in the highest.

Hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest.

The people shall repeat his words while going round.

48. Priest : From His hosanna He showed miracles and wonders which have never been done before and will never happen again.

Hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest.

The people shall repeat his words.

49. Priest : From His hosanna He showed grace and power, came down from His great throne without being moved from the foundation of His house.

Hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest.

The people shall repeat his words.

50. Priest : From His hosanna He granted the sinners a spring of tears so that He may justify the wicked and purify the filthy and bring back those who sinned through ignorance.

Hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest, hosanna in the highest.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

51. From His hosanna He granted the blind light which cannot be extinguished again and which the world cannot find.

52. He knows before one thinks, examines before one thinks, and nothing is hidden from Him.

53. Deacon : For the sake of the happy and blessed and honourable Patriarch Abba (_____) and the blessed Archbishop Abba (_____), Abba Titus, Abba Philemon, Abba Andronicus, Abba Basilicos. For the sake of thy servants our fathers the orthodox archbishops, our fathers the bishops, our fathers the priests, our brothers the deacons.

54. Have compassion upon these Thy people, rest the souls of them all, and have mercy upon them. Yea, Lord our God, forgive them their sins, do not look upon their sinful deeds, those who will draw near to receive Thy holy body. And those who will not draw near, order them to draw near with the commandment of Thy word ; and all of them will be clean.

55. To these and to all, grant rest to their souls and have mercy upon them in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; and those who have absented themselves from this church, our mother, pity them all and have mercy upon them, unto the ages of ages.

56. The assistant priest shall say the following instead of the Prayer of Benediction

O holy Trinity, Who holds the whole world, who has done great and wonderful deeds through the power of Thy word,

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

57. bless the east and the west, the north and the south, the north east and the south east, (the north west and the south west), bless the heaven, the earth, the sea, the rivers, the source of water, and all the springs of water.

58. Bless the winds of the sky and the rains. Bless the sun, moon and stars. Bless the mountains and hills, the trees, herbs and the fruit of the earth.

59. Bless those that are under heaven and those that are under earth.

O Christ our God, fill their hearts with the fear of Thy name and make their lives to prosper for ever.

(+ over the people three times).

60. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

61. Priest : To these and to all Thy servants and Thy handmaids grant rest ; to the souls of their fathers also and our fathers the holy bishops ; our father Paul, and our father Peter, our father Abba James the Bishop, and our father the honourable bishop Abba Matthew.

John, Simon and James the son of Alphaeus and James the Apostle, brother of our Lord and Bishop of Jerusalem.

62. For the sake of thy servants Mark, Luke, Titus, Philemon, Clement, Basil, Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Abba Heryacos the bishop, and our honourable father the Patriarch Abba Yohannes, and our father archbishop Abba Shenouda, beautify their lives and make the savour of their incense unfailing and pity us through their prayers, unto the ages of ages.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

63. First rest the souls of our fathers the archbishops and our fathers the bishops who gained their rest in this church, the priests, deacons, anagnosts and singers together with the door keepers, because Thou, Lord, knows that which is hidden raise them in Thy holy resurrection.

64. And cause us, who have gathered to take Thy holy body and drink Thy precious blood, to stand at Thy right hand with those who have fulfilled Thy will.

65. Cause our children and our young men to grow and lengthen their days till old age, do not suffer our rich ones to be poor, enrich our poor, heal our sick, do not suffer our whole ones to be sick, have mercy upon the dead, and pity the living.

66. People : Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

67. Priest : Bless me (+ over the Host once) and hallow my soul (+ over the cup once), and purify my body (+ once more over both) so that I may receive Thy life-giving body and drink Thy blood, the mysterious divine blood.

68. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

69. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, unto the ages of ages.

70. At third time he shall dip his finger into the blood and sign the body.

Priest : Grant it together unto them that take of it that it may be unto them for life and salvation for ever.

People : Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

71. Priest : Grant us to be united through thy Holy Spirit and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee forever.

The people shall repeat his words.

72. Priest : Blessed be the Name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

73. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

74. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

75. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

O Lord, Who spoke with our father Abraham, while he has sitting under the tree, saying, O Abraham, O Abraham, O Abraham, I am your God and your fathers' God, I am not a strange God.

76. Keep My commandment and My word which I have spoken to you and I will grant the earth to your children and multiply your seed like the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea.

77. Stand up, O Abraham, and take a platter of bread and a vial of wine, make a pair of scissors, take with thee two of your household and mount the mountain and call the priest who is called Melchisedec, call him three times saying, O man of God, O man of God, O man of God. At that time there will come a fearful man; when you see him do not be afraid.¹

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

78. Abraham stood up as God told him and took with him a platter of bread, a vial of wine and two of his household. He made a pair of scissors, mounted the mountain and cried out saying, O man of God, O man of God, O man of God, come out. Then a very fearful man came out, and when Abraham saw him he fell on his face and became like a dead man.

79. And Melchisedec stretched forth his hands and raised him saying, "Stand up, O Abraham, and do not be afraid, because God Who sent you unto me, told me that you would come unto me."

80. And Abraham stood up, and both spoke together about the greatness of the Lord our God.

81. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father Who art in heaven . . . (see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

82. Priest : Abraham stood up and took a pair of scissors and cut the nails of his hands and feet and the hair of his head.

Melchisedec stood up and took the platter of bread and the vial of wine and raised his eyes towards heaven, gave thanks, blessed and broke and granted blessing to Abraham and his household.¹

83. O Lord our God, Who accepted the offering of this righteous one, accept this our sacrifice and purify us completely: soul, body, spirit and mind, so that, with pure heart and fear of soul, we may speak continually without fear and say, O holy God:

Our Father who art in heaven . . .

(see Anaphora #2:69 : p. 62)

84. We beseech Thee, O holy kind Father, lover of good, lead us lest we wander into temptation. Let sin not have dominion over us, rather deliver us from every evil deed and from thought of it, even its opposition, its deceit and trouble.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

85. Destroy our tempter, send him away from us, and rebuke the trouble which he planted into us, uproot from us the motives which thrust us into sin, and deliver us with Thy holy power through Jesus Christ our Lord.

86. People : The angelic hosts of the Saviour of the world, stand before the Saviour of the world, and encircle the Saviour of the world even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world. Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

87. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

88. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

89. Priest : The gift (1) of the grace of Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ has been completed. We have believed in His life-giving sufferings, proclaimed His death, and believed in his resurrection in a perfect mystery.

90. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship and Thee do we glorify.

91. Priest : “Prayer of Penitence” (Anaphora of the Apostles: # 72-88, pp. 47, 48)

92. Deacon : Give heed.

93. Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

(1) i.e. the Holy Communion.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY

94. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

95. The priest shall then lifts up the whole Host with his hand and says : Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant).

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall chant them three times and the people twice.

96. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

97. Then he shall turn to the people and say:

Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles 95 -126: pp. 49 - 52).

98. After receiving the holy Communion:

Priest : “Pilot of the Soul”

Again we supplicate God the almighty, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ

99. O Thou Who loved the humility of man more than the greatness of angels, O Thou Who loved the poverty of Adam more than the treasures of the tribe of Abraham.

100. O Thou Who loved the beauty of David more than the beauty of Eliab (2) the son of the Jebusite : O Thou Who loves man, while Thou art God, Thou art the Lord our God :

101. Deacon : Pray ye.

102. Priest : O purifier, purify our souls and bodies, (1) O merciful God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

103. Thou mixed water with wine, wind with fire, water with earth, likewise unite our weakness with the power of Thy divinity.

Unite also our sufferings with the sufferings of Thy cross. (1)

104. Unto Thee we offer our prayers, Thee we supplicate and Thee we entreat, unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

105. Priest : “The Laying on of the Hand”

Lord our God, bless Thy servants and Thy handmaids who have taken the trouble to come to Thy sanctuary where the greatness of Thy glory dwells. Bless men and women, old and babies.

106. Unite us with the power of Thy holy angels, cover us with the curtain of Thy light, hide us (2) with the tree of Thy cross and keep us apart from every evil deed.

107. Make us to dwell in the congregation of the saints (3) who offer up prayer at every time and every hour. And to us who have eaten Thy body and drunk Thy blood, let them be for the remission of sin and for eternal life, through Thine only-begotten Son through Whom to Thee, with Him and with the Holy Spirit, be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

1. The Anaphora of St. Epiphanius, (2) Bishop of the Island of Cyprus. May his prayer and blessing be with our (Head of state: King, Queen, President . . .), unto the ages of ages. Amen.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

3. Priest : God is great in His greatness, holy in His holiness, blessed in His beatitude and glorified in His glory.

He is the first_ yet of Him it is not asked, "When was His beginning ?" With Him it is ever "now." Yet of Him it is not asked, "How long will He endure?" ; And He is the last. Yet of Him it is not asked, "When will His end be?"

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. On 17th Ginbot (May 25), the memorial day of the death of St. Epiphanius.
- b. On the fast day or days of Epiphany.
- c. On Great Thursday (that is, the Thursday before Fasika).
- d. During the rainy season.

(2) He was born in 315 at Bezanduca, a small village in Palestine, of Jewish parents. After having been converted to become a Christian, he came to Egypt and spent a long time in its monasteries. On his return to Palestine, he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Eleutherapolis and became the president of a monastery which he founded near his native place. In 357 he was consecrated Bishop of Cyprus - an office which he held till his death on 17th Ginbot (May 25) 402 A.D.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

4. There is no beginning of His being, there is no end of His existence, His days are numberless and His years are countless.

His youth does not wax old, the strength of His power does not diminish, His countenance is incorruptible and the light of His face cannot be dimmed.

5. The sea of His wisdom is unlimited, His merciful commands are countless, the range of His kingdom is immeasurable and His spacious government is boundless.

6. So invisible is He, that man cannot find Him by concepts, so lofty is He that man cannot understand Him with His heart, so high is He that the eagles cannot reach Him, and so deep is He that the fish cannot swim unto Him.

7. He is higher than the heads of the mountains and deeper than the depth of the sea. He is so strong that the Kings cannot rise against Him, and He is so victorious that the rulers cannot stand against Him.

8. He is so wise that He can destroy the counsel of the wise, His omniscience is such that He can make the thought of the counselors to be of no effect, (1) He is so mighty that He can loose the bridle of the strong, and He is so courageous that He can pulverize the teeth of sinners and put down the arms of the haughty.

9. He is so honourable that He can put to shame the face of the hypocrites, and He is so mighty that He can cast away the light of the filthy.

(1) Ps 32 (33) : 10.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

10. He is the only one without equal, and He has absolute authority, without the help of kinsmen. The heavens will be destroyed, and the land will vanish, and all will wax old like a garment, but He is the same for ever. (1)

11. Wonderful is the movement of the sea, but more wonderful is God in His highest heaven. None resembles Him and none competes with Him from among all the creatures and all the children of gods. He Himself alone is God, He Himself alone is Lord, He Himself alone is creator and He Himself alone is maker.

12. He does not seek a helper for the plan He conceived, and He does not want an adviser for the work He desired. He knows all things before they happen as if they had happened before and that which has not happened as if it had happened.

13. He inspects the mind without asking and examines the hearts without seeking, and sees in darkness without light.

14. He knows the righteous before they do righteousness, He judges the sinners before they commit sin, He understands the prudent before they go out from their fathers' loins and understands the sinners from their mothers' wombs.

15. Nothing is hidden, nothing is concealed nothing is invisible to Him, all is open unto Him, all is spread before His eyes, all is written in His book, and all is present to His mind.

16. He does the great, countless, honourable and marvellous deeds which are inscrutable. His works are more wonderful than we can comprehend.

(1) Ps. 101 (102) : 26, 27.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

His power is more marvelous than anything we have heard and His glory is more astonishing than any had told us.

17. He made light out of darkness, He knows how to divide clouds, He divides water at His pleasure and He hides the elect with clouds.

18. He built the earth and prepared its boundaries, and established its ends in the way He saw, and strengthened its corners.

19. He fenced the sea with doors when it went out of its mother's womb (1), He made the clouds to be its clothes, and wrapped it with mist, He limited it and put into it doors and locks and said to it, "Reach here and do not go beyond your limit, but your storm will move within you.

20. The light of dawn was arranged over it, and the morning star knew His commandment. He took mud from the earth and created the living being and made him speak on the earth.

21. He reached the ends of the sea and walked in the paths of the deep.

22. Out of terror, the gates of death will be opened to Him, and the gatekeepers of hell will be afraid as soon as they see Him. He knows the spaciousness under heaven and that which happens above heaven.

23. Through His commandment frost comes out of its treasure and the wind blows under heaven. He leads the rain along the way of the wilderness to fall on the country where there is no man and wherein mortal man does not live.

(1) When it was created.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

24. He established the course of water and opens the winter every year and brings the summer back in its due time. He calls the clouds with His word and water answers Him trembling.

25. He sends the thunderbolt and it goes and answers Him saying "What shall I do?" He counts the clouds through His wisdom and suspends the heaven over the earth.

26. He alone puts on the power of the highest heaven and is adorned with glory and honour.

27. Him hallow the fiery cherubim and the seraphim dressed in light with ceaseless words and a mouth which does not keep silent and a tongue which does not tire; and all say together with one voice answering Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

28. Deacon : Answer ye.

29. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

30. Priest : Holy, holy, holy art Thou God, Lord of the holy ones, the holiness of Thy glory fills heaven and earth.

31. All is from Him, all is for His sake, and all is His. Heaven is His, and the heaven of heavens is His. The breadth of the highest heaven is the throne of His glory, and the wide earth is His footstool.

32. The sun is His, the moon is His, and the stars are the work of His hands. Clouds are His messengers, winds are His chariots and fire is the wall of His house.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

33. Water is the roof of His house, the gables of it are snow, light is His tabernacle, the lightning of glory is the veil of His hiding-place, and His going is in the air.

34. The voice of His speech is in the thunderbolt, the sound of thunder is in the chariots, the sea is His band-maid, the water-flood of the rivers is His servant, and cold and frost do His pleasure.

35. He causes the clouds to ascend from the ends of the earth, He makes lightning for the rain (1), He pours rain like drops from a strainer, He scatters the hoarfrost like ashes, he casts forth His ice like morsels (2), and He causes the grass to grow for the cattle (3).

36. He does according to His thought, completes what He began, orders according to His will. He makes sad and gives pleasure, impoverishes and enriches, dishonours and honours, kills and quickens, makes sick and heals, judges and justifies.

37. He spares him whom He wills to spare, He distresses him whom He wills to distress, He will have mercy on whom He will have mercy, (4) will have compassion on whom He will have compassion.

38. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins.

39. Priest : He is kind without evil, meek without revenge, patient without wrath, righteous without sin, pure without filthiness, and upright without perversion.

40. He is the giver without hindrance, gracious without stint, the forgiver of sin without revenge or envy.

(1) Ps. 134 (135) :7. (2) Ps. 147:16, 17. (3) Ps. 103 (104):14. (4) Rom. 9 : 18

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

41. He is near unto those who call upon Him (1), benefactor unto those who fear him, He is the open door unto those who knock for Him, the prepared way without a stumbling-block and the pure path without thorns.

42. He alone is God, the God of gods and Lord of lords.

43. After this, when He saw that the blood of the holy prophets, from the blood of the righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias Son of Barachias, was not sufficient for the salvation of the world, (2) He sent unto us His Son, a Saviour and Redeemer, to save us, redeem us, and take before Him the remembrance of the living and the dead.

44. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles # 6 - 9: p. 43)

45. The assistant priest shall say the Prayer of Benediction. (Anaphora of the Apostles 10-21: pp.43,44)

46. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

47. Priest : While He was yet there He came and He was sent without it being noised abroad.

48. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

49. Priest : He came down without being moved from His throne and without being removed from His place.

50. Deacon : Look to the east.

51. Priest : He was conceived in the womb while He was filling everywhere, was born without opening the seal of virginity.

52. Deacon : Let us give heed.

(1) Ps. 144 (145):18. (2) Mt. 23:33-40

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

53. Priest : He grew, like an infant, and grew little by little (1) until he matured like a man.

54. At the age of thirty He was baptized in Jordan to purify us (2) from sin by the washing of regeneration. (3)

55. He was tempted by the Devil, he hungered and thirsted, walked and appeared preaching the gospel of the kingdom of heaven.

56. At his time he shall offer incense.

People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom (Anaphora of the Apostles 34: p. 45)

57. Priest : Then He stretched forth His hands on the tree of the cross for suffering to cure the wounds of the sick by the sprinkling of His blood. (4)

58. Priest : In that night, Thursday evening, which is the beginning of Friday, when He sat at the house of Lazarus, his friend

59. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

60. Priest : He took into His hands the unleavened bread of wheat from that which they brought unto Him for supper,

At this time he shall raise the bread.

61. People : We believe that this is He; truly we believe.

62. Priest : gave thanks, blessed (+ three times) and broke,

Then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

and gave it to His disciples and said unto them, "Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is the communion of My body which will be broken for you."

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

63. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.
We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God ; that this is He we truly believe.

64. Priest : Again He mixed the cup of wine with water, gave thanks, blessed (+ three times), hallowed and gave it to His apostles and said unto them, “Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is the communion of My blood which will be shed for you.”

He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

65. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

66. Priest : Let this service be unto you for the remembrance of My death and My resurrection.

67. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection ; we believe in Thy ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

68. Priest : And we, our Lord and our God, pray and beseech Thee and ask of Thy goodness, O Lover of man, that Thou may send the Holy Spirit and power upon this (pointing) bread and upon this (pointing) cup to make this bread (+ once) thy holy body, and this cup (+ once) the blood from Thy side which speaks (+ once more over both of them).

People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

69. Deacon : With all our heart, let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

70. People : As it was, is, and shall be, unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

71. At this time he shall dip his finger into the Blood and sign the Body.

Priest : Grant it together unto them that take of it, that it may be unto them for blessing, for remission of sin, for joy and rejoicing, for renewal of soul, body and spirit, and for strengthening of faith till the last breath.

People : Amen.

72. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

73. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

74. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

75. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

76. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Where is the country of Wisdom (1), where is its abode, where is its province, and where can the trace of its way be found?

77. Who crossed the sea and bought it for red gold; Who ascended above the cloud and brought it down? Mortal man does not know its way, it is not for mortal man.

(1) Anaphora of St. Dioscorus #48, p.161.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

78. It is forgotten by all men, and it is hidden from all the birds of heaven (1). Those who possess it gain friendship with God, and those who hate it love death. It is more beautiful than the sun and all the concourse of stars. It is compared with the Light (2) because it was in the beginning.

79. Though it is in the old, it renews all: and in every generation, it enters into the souls of the righteous.

80. It is better than rubies; and all honour is not to be compared to it. It has counsel and power, strength and knowledge, by it kings reign, and the powerful decree justice.

81. By it the great are honoured, and by it the rulers take hold of the earth. It loves them that love it. It keeps them that keep it, and those that seek it find favour.

82. It walks in the way of righteousness and moves about in the path of righteousness to grant them that know it riches and to fill their treasuries with rejoicing (3).

83. He who knows all knows it, and He who understands all beautifies its way. He gave it to his servant Jacob and to his holy Israel. Afterwards, it appeared on the earth and walked like man.

84. Behold she has built a house for herself, and established seven pillars, she has killed her beasts, poured her wine in the bowl, and furnished her table.(4)

85. She has sent forth her servants ceaselessly proclaiming and saying : Whoever is simple let him turn in towards me:

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

as for him that wants understanding, she says to him, Come, eat of my bread, and drink of my wine, forsake the foolish and live (1).

86. But wisdom is our Saviour Who redeemed us with the sacrifice of His body, and bought us with the sprinkling of His blood, and chose us for His kingdom for ever.(2)

87. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven . . . (see Anaphora #2 : #69 : p. 62)

88. Priest : O God of lights, God of authorities, God of the archangels, Thou did loosen the soul bound with death and did lighten him who was nailed in darkness with the nails of the cross of Thine Only-begotten.

89. O Lord, Thou art He Who loosened our sufferings and all our burdens, and loosen the bonds of our sin, and took our trouble and quicken us, and became to us the way towards the place of life, Thou did turn us from destruction unto salvation

90. O Lord, our almighty God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Whose curtain is light, Whose face is fire, and the throne of Whose glory is ineffable, and the abode of joy which cannot be spoken of, which He has prepared for the holy ones. His garments are the treasures of light.

91. Thou keeps the holy angels, all of whom tremble and glorify Thee when Thou looks at them the mountains melt, and when Thy name is spoken of, springs come forth from the depth.

92. Thou art He who covered heaven gathering (all) in Thy hand the earth and the depths together tremble before Thee.

(1) i.e. the angels. (2) i.e. God the Father. (3) Prov. 8 : 11-20. (4) Prov. 9 : 1-2

(1) Prov. 9 : 3-6. (2) 1Cor. 1 : 18 - 31

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

93. All the hosts of the enemy were discomfited before Thee, the Devil fell, the beast was trodden down and the snake was destroyed.

94. All the gentiles who believed in Thee were enlightened and strengthened by Thee. O Lord, through Thee life was seen, hope was strengthened, the gospel, through which destruction was destroyed, has been preached, and salvation was confirmed.

95. O Lord our almighty God, make us worthy to partake of this (pointing) bread, the body of Thy life-giving Son, and of this (pointing) cup, the speaking blood of Thy Messiah, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever, and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

96. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world, stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and the blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

97. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

98. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

99. Priest : Let the Lamb come that we may see Him with our eyes, immolate Him with our hands and rejoice in Him. May His body be joined with this bread, and may His blood be poured into this cup.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

100. Let none of us think when he eats of this (pointing) bread that he eats mere flesh without blood and Spirit, and let none of us think when he drinks of this (pointing) cup that he drinks mere blood without body and Spirit, but one is the Body, Blood and Spirit as His divinity became one with His humanity, unto the ages of ages.

101. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, do we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

102. Priest : Prayer of Penitence.

103. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

104. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

105. The priest shall then lift up the whole host with his hand and say :

Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant, and fifteen times in a low chant.)

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

106. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

Then he shall turn to the people and say:

107. Priest : Lord our God, look upon Thy people that are penitent (Anaphora of the Apostles 95 - 138: pp. 49 - 53).

(1) Anaphora of St. Athanasius .150-153, and Anaphora of St. Dioscorus 52, 53.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

After receiving the Holy Communion.

108. Priest : "Pilot of the Soul"

Again we supplicate the Almighty God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, because He did neither disdain nor refuse our supplication, nor did He remove His mercy from us, because the Lord our God is merciful.

Deacon : Pray ye.

109. Priest :

Yea Lord, Thou art the God of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the King of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art Almighty.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Governor of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Saviour of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Judge of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Life-giver of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Keeper of all.
Yea Lord, Thou art the Nourisher of all.

110. As Thou did join the body of Thy Son with our body, and Thou did mix the blood of Thy Messiah with our blood, so put Thy fear in our hearts and the beauty of Thy worship in our minds.

111. We, who are carnal, mind the things of the flesh and do the works of the flesh and walk in the way of the flesh. But Thou taught us the work of the Spirit and makes us to understand the law of the Spirit and leads us in the way of the Spirit.

112. Because if Thou pity us, we sinners, then Thou will be called compassionate. Thou pities the righteous because of their works and recompenses them according to their righteousness.

ANAPHORA OF ST. EPIPHANIUS

113. Remember not against us former iniquities let Thy tender mercies, O God, speedily prevent us. (1)

114. Towards Thee we cry, towards Thee we weep, Thee we entreat, unto the endless ages.

People : Amen (2)

115. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

He is higher than all that is high. No mind and no heart can interpret the riches of Thy gift, O Master, because Thou has hid these things from the wise and prudent and has revealed them unto babes.

116. These things which prophets and kings have desired to see but have not seen, Thou has granted us sinners: that we may serve and be sanctified by them, when Thou established for us the order of Thine only-begotten Son. The hidden mystery cannot be compared to the blood of the old law nor the righteousness of the flesh, but it is the heavenly Lamb and the sacrifice speaking without flesh.

117. Sanctify the lips of us who offer this sacrifice, and purify our hearts from being mixed with vanity, and send upon us the grace of the Holy Spirit that we may greet one another with a holy kiss and receive of Thy holy undying gift through Jesus Christ.

118. Through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit, the life-giver, Who is equal with Thee, be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

(1)Ps. 78 (79):7. (2) #109-114, here, same as for Anaphora of St. Dioscorus # 61-67, p. 163.

The ANAPHORA of St. JOHN CHRYSTOSTOM¹

1. The Anaphora of John Chrysostom 2, may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King, Queen, President . . .) unto endless ages.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

3. Deacon : Let your thought be above, and your heart in heaven, recognize where you stand ; hear the word of righteousness and listen to the good news.

4. Priest : Behold we proclaim the existence of the Father Who was before the world was created and will live for ever.

None was before Him, none will be after Him, none is like Him, and none knows what is His being.

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions

- a. 27th of every month, the Feast of the Saviour of the world.
- b. On 10th Magabit (March 19), the memorial day of discovering the cross of the Lord by St. Helen, mother of Constantine.
- a. On Great Saturday, preceding Easter.
- d. On every Wednesday and Friday.
- e. On 12th Ginbot (May 20), the memorial day of the death of St. John Chrysostom.

(2) He was born. in 347 at Antioch. As a young man, he was sent to Athens to study Greek philosophy. Then he chose the monastic life and lived for some time in one of the monasteries and was afterwards ordained as a priest at Antioch. In 387 he was consecrated as Bishop of Constantinople. He was a good author and, wrote many books. As a preacher he was very powerful and had the courage to rebuke the sinners, poor or rich, humble or noble. He rebuked even the Queen who, for this reason, exiled him. He died on 12 Ginbot (May 20) 407 A. D.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JOHN CHRYSTOSTOM

5. He who was before all, before the heavens were stretched out, before the face of the earth appeared, before the mountains arose, before the airs expanded He was in his place.

6. Before the depths were established and the floods began to flow as rivers, He was in His place.

7. Before the winds blew, before the thunderbolts flashed, before the lightnings were drawn out, before the thunders thundered, and before the clouds started to spread, He was in His place.

8. Before the lights appeared, before the darkness was to cover, before the light of the day gave light, and before night was fixed, He was in His place.

9. Before the sun fixed the length of the day and before the moon fixed the length of the night, He was in His place.

10. Before the stars glittered, before the spirits moved, and before the angels were created, He was in His place.

11. Before the speaking soul, before the mortal flesh, and before all the creatures, those that live in hiding and those that live in the open; those that are above and those that are beneath, He was in His place.

12. Before time and hours, before nights and days, before months and years before days of the week and the seasons, He was in His place.

13. His glory is from Himself, His praise is from Himself, and the riches of His grace are full and perfect.

14. Then let us speak of the greatness of His mercies which have appeared unto us and which cannot be counted or measured.

ANAPHORA OF ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

15. When we transgressed His commandment through the advice of the cursed serpent we were driven from the garden of delight unto destruction, from life unto death, from freedom unto slavery, and we submitted ourselves to the yoke of sin.

16. But He did not forsake or neglect us, who were His workmanship, and did not take vengeance upon us because of our sins so that we should utterly perish as we committed sin against Him, but He loved us, visited us, spared us, had mercy upon us and saved us from the hand of him who enslaved us.

17. He sent unto us his saving and redeeming Son, the messenger of His counsel, His right hand, His arm, His power, and the wisdom of His Father. Through Him He did all that He desired in this world.

18. Whom He did predestinate, them He called; whom He called, them He loved; whom He loved, them He honoured; whom He honoured, them He justified; whom He justified, them He glorified to be an adornment for His Son. (2)

19. And through Him He gathered us to the great faith, we who were scattered, and made us to Himself a gathered people, and drew us nearer unto Himself to glorify Him.

20. He wrote our names in the book of life so that the remembrance of everyone, the dead and the living, might be before Him.

21. Deacon For the sake of the blessed . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles 6-9, p. 43)

1) Isa. 9 :4; 10:27; Gal. 5:1 (2) Rom. 8:29-30

ANAPHORA OF ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

22. The Assistant priest shall say the "Prayer of Benediction" (Anaphora of the Apostles 10-21, pp. 43, 44).

23. Asst. Deacon : Lord pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

24. Priest : Again we proclaim the existence of the only-begotten, what He is, what was his descent, and what was His birth.

25. He came without going out of His Father, He descended without removing from His position, He came without being separated from the Trinity, He came down without breaking His unity, and He dwelt in a daughter of flesh without leaving His throne.

26. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

27. Priest : He was conceived in the womb without letting there be any place that was not full of Him, He was bound in the womb without making subtraction above, and was born without making addition beneath.

28. Deacon : Look to the east.

29. Priest : He became man, absolutely without sin, and appeared like a servant, working like God, as the preachers of His gospel witnessed.

30. Deacon : Let us give heed.

31. Priest : He was glorified by His Father, He was given thanks by the angels, He was praised by men and sanctified by Himself.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

32. The holiness of His glory filled heaven and earth. Henceforth, at all times, we give our hearts no rest but speak of the holiness of His glory and cry saying : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

33. Deacon : Answer ye.

34. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

35. Priest : Truly holy, holy, holy art Thou, Jesus Christ, Who is sanctified by the mouths of all,

36. and Who, through Thy goodness, has granted to all Thy holy ones to be holy. His holy things cannot be destroyed or perish, those things which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, which God has prepared for His holy disciples and pure apostles who loved Him; and He has shown them the order of the holy communion.

37. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

38. Priest : He took bread in His holy, blessed and spotless hands.

At this time he shall raise the bread.

39. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

40. Priest : He looked up to heaven towards Thee, His Father, God and Lord of all, Who is above all, gave thanks, blessed (+ three times) and broke, and gave it to His disciples and said to them, "This (pointing) is My body," which is indeed the food of righteousness ; whoever eats of it has eternal life. Take, eat of it.

41. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God, that this is He we truly believe.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

Priest : And likewise also the cup mixing water with wine, He gave thanks, blessed (+ three times), sanctified, gave it to His disciples and said to them This (pointing) is My blood which is indeed the drink of life, whoever drinks of it has eternal life; take, drink ye all of it.

He shall move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

42. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

43. Priest : It is a sign to you and to those who will come after you, so do likewise in remembrance of Me until I come.

Whenever ye gather in My name, proclaim My death, My resurrection and Mine ascension into the heavens.

44. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection ; we believe Thine ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

45. Priest : And we, who have gathered together, proclaim the sufferings of him who does not suffer and proclaim the death of Him who does not die. In the same night when He sat with His disciples He gave His soul over to death with the will of His Father and in His own good pleasure.

46. They took hold of Him who takes hold of all, bound the ruler of all and shackled the Son of the living God ; they drew Him in wrath and He followed them in love, they took Him and He followed them like a meek sheep which is dumb before its shearers.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

47. They caused to stand in the court Him, before Whom stand archangels in fear and trembling. He who forgives sins, was accused as a sinner by them, the Judge of judges was judged by them.

48. Him, Who crowns seraphim with a coronet, they crowned with a crown of thorns. Him, Who clothes cherubim with garments of might, they clothed with a scarlet robe to mock Him.

49. A wicked servant strengthened his hand to strike the face of Him from Whose face the cherubim are hidden being covered with wings of fire.

50. They knelt before him, mocking Him Whom the hosts of angels worship in great fear.¹

51. Oh what humility is this! Oh what patience is this! Oh what a silence is this!

52. Oh what a kindness is this! Oh what a love of man is this!

53. Love drew down the Son of God from His throne and brought Him unto death. Him, Who had no wickedness, they crucified as wicked. Him, Who is the maker of life, they numbered with the wicked.

54. Oh the hands which formed Adam were nailed with the nails of the cross.

Oh the feet which walked in the garden were nailed with the nails of the cross.

55. Oh the mouth which breathed the spirit of life into the nostrils of Adam drank vinegar mixed with gall.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

56. What mouth, what lips, what tongue can express the sufferings of the Son?

57. The heart is broken, the mind is perplexed, the soul trembles and the flesh is weary when the sufferings of the Beloved are mentioned.

58. The Immortal died: died to destroy death, died to quicken the dead.

59. Deacon : Ye who love Him, weep and mourn over him.

60. Priest : Woe! Woe! Woe!¹
Emmanuel our God.

The people shall repeat his words.

61. Priest : Woe! Woe! Woe! Jesus our Saviour.

The people shall repeat his words.

62. Priest : Woe! Woe! Woe! Christ our King.

The people shall repeat his words.

63. Priest : Woe! Woe! Woe! the righteous men took Him down from the tree, brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes and pure fine linen cloths to wrap His body.

64. People : Holy God² holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal, Who was born from the holy Virgin Mary, have mercy upon us, Lord. Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal, Who was baptized in Jordan and crucified on the tree of the cross, have mercy upon us, Lord.

65. At this time he shall offer incense with the cross-spoon.

² See Preparatory Ser-vice #174: p. 33.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

66. Priest : On the third day he restored His soul into His body.

67. People : Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal, Who rose from the dead on the third day, ascended into heaven in glory, sat at the right hand of His Father and again will come in glory to judge the living and the dead, have mercy upon us, Lord.

Glory be to the Father, glory be to the Son, glory be to the Holy Spirit, both now and ever, and unto the ages of ages. Amen and amen, so be it, so be it.

68. Priest : He rose from the dead, absolutely without corruption and set us free from the yoke of sin. In this body, with the power of His divinity, He ascended into heaven to His accustomed position.

69. Deacon : Bow your heads before God.

70. Priest : (in a low voice) We pray Thee and beseech Thee, as Thou sent Thy Holy Spirit upon Thy holy disciples and pure apostles, so also send upon us this Thy Holy Spirit Who sanctifies our souls, bodies and spirits that we may be purified through Him from all our sins and may draw near to receive Thy divine mystery, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, for ever.

71. Priest : (in a loud voice) Lord, remember the covenant (1) of Thy word which Thou established with our fathers and with Thy holy apostles to send upon us this Thy Holy Spirit Whom the world cannot receive. Thou taught us that we may call upon Thee saying, Our Father Who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come.

CHRYSOSTOM

72. May this Holy Spirit, who is neither searchable nor inferior, come from above the highest heaven to bless this (pointing) bread and to hallow the cup, to make this bread the communion of Thy life-giving body (+ once over the bread) and also to make this cup the communion of Thy merciful blood. (+ once over the cup and once more over both the bread and the cup.)

73. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us. Lord have mercy upon us.

74. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

75. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

76. At this time he shall (dip his finger into the Blood and sign the Body).

Priest : May he be joined with this bread and this cup that they may be for sanctification, purification from filthiness, resurrection from the dead, inheritance of the kingdom of heaven and everlasting life.

People : Amen.

77. Priest : Grant us to be united through thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

78. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

79. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

80. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

81. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Again we supplicate the almighty God, Father of our Lord and Saviour. Jesus Christ.

82. Oh this mystery cannot be solved or interpreted! What is His name, and what is His Father's name, where is His country, and who knows His dwelling-place?

83. The thought of the heart, thinking deeply, cannot find the answer to the question nor speak of his first and last being.

84. He proclaimed to us Himself and His Father in the way we could bear, (He proclaimed to us) that our Saviour truly came to the world clothed in the body which He took from us.

85. This is what we sacrifice for our salvation as He was sacrificed on Calvary for the life of all the world. This bread is not useless as you see it earthly, dry, baked, able to be felt and touched, but it is the fire of the godhead, which burns the thorn of sin. It is so consuming that it consumes the wicked, it is so burning that it burns the sinners.

86. O my brothers, believers, know and examine yourselves, see if any one of us has a blemish in his body and sin in his soul, that he may depart and may not draw near.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

87. If any one of us has revenge in his heart, let him depart and not stand. But blessed is he who has purified his soul and body; let him come and receive and pray because of his sin, because the Lord our God is merciful.

88. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father Who art in heaven .

.. (see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

(Also) According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (thrice)

89. Priest : The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting (1). This is the mercy of God Who sent His only-begotten Son Who takes away the sin of the world. This is the mercy of God Who gave the priests tongues of fire to loosen the bonds of sin.

90. Now, Lord our God, our heavenly Father, loose us from the bonds of death.

91. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and the blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

92. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

93. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

(1) Ps. 102 (103):17.

ANAPHORA OF
ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

94. Priest : Truly forgive that He may forgive unto you. Truly remit that He may remit unto you. Truly pray that you may not enter into temptation. Temptation is to take His body in subtlety and to receive His blood without fear while the blame of sin is upon you.

95. Now, with pure heart and holy soul and body refined, let us draw near for our salvation. Come, let us worship and serve Him.

96. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

97. Priest : Prayer of Penitence.
(Anaph. of the Apostles 72-88: p. 47-48).

98. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

99. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

100. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hands and say: Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant)

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

101. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

ANAPHORA OF

CHRYSO

102. Priest : shall turn to the people and say : Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles 95 - 96: p. 49; and then 97-138: pp. 49 - 53)

103. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : Pilot of the Soul.

Before the glory of Thy holiness Thy servants and handmaids have prostrated themselves in soul, body and spirit. Incline Thine ear unto their supplication.

104. Bless them who mind the heavenly things with the blessing of Thine angels and powers. Bless the work of their hands, and be with them in every good work.

105. Grant that by their having received of Thy holy mystery they may be prudent, watchful and freed from all evil, and may feed their souls, bodies and spirits, through our Lord Jesus Christ

106. Through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory, dominion, both now and ever, and unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

107. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

Good things have been done to you, good things have been done to you, good things have been done to you. O sheep of Christ's pasture, you have eaten and have been satisfied, you have drunk and have quenched your thirst. Return to your houses in peace; may the Lord be with all of you.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL⁽¹⁾

1. The Anaphora of St. Cyril (2) may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King, Queen, President . . .), unto endless ages. Amen.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions

- a. Ascension day.
- b. memorial days of deaths.
- c. feast days of Abraham, Job and Elijah.
- d. On 3rd Hamle (July 10). the memorial day of the death of St. Cyril.

(2) Cyril, the 24th patriarch of Alexandria, was the nephew of Theophilus, the previous Patriarch. He was born in 376. His uncle sent him to the Theological College of Alexandria, then to the monastery of St. Macarius. In 402 he was consecrated as Patriarch of Alexandria after the death of his uncle. It was he who presided at the third ecumenical council, held at Ephesus in 431 where he effectively contended against the heresy of Nestorius. Following the deprivation and exile of his formidable opponent, Nestorius, he returned to Alexandria in triumph, hailed as the great champion of the faith, and thence continued the theological strife for years. As a dogmatic theologian, his works speak to those seeking precise and firm definitions of orthodox belief along with tenacity of conviction. In addition to his Twelve Anathemas, he wrote five other books against Nestorius, a tract on 'Worshipping in Spirit and in Truth,' several commentaries, festal orations, and a reply to the Emperor Julian's attack on the church. He died on 3rd Hamle (July 10) 435 A.D. Others say that he died in 444.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

3. Priest : The Lord, God of gods, Lord of lords, the invisible God, Whose existence is unsearchable, is higher than all, yea, His nature is unfathomable.

4. He is the consuming fire, the life-giving fire, the God of gods and the Lord of lords, Whose throne is above the heavens and Whose footstool is the earth, He is high and far away, and dwells in light.

5. High and invisible is He Who dwells in heaven. He is clothed in garments of fire and adorned with flames of fire, His throne is on the heads of fire (1), His going to and fro is through impalpable air, His high firmament is in heaven, clouds are His chariot, His way is in the stormy sea and on the heads of fire (1) who minister Him.

6. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

7. Priest : With their two wings of fire they cover their face that the consuming fire may not consume them, with their two luminous wings they cover their feet that his terrible light may not burn them, and with their two spiritual wings they fly unto the ends of the world.

8. Seraphim together with their leaders, cherubim according to their sanctification, the angels in their ranks, the watchful according to their armies, the heads of the watchful according to their tribes, the angels of fire according to their light, and the spiritual according to their position, give thanks and hallow with terrible voice, cry aloud, and on high, and while sanctifying they say : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

9. Deacon : Answer ye.

10. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

11. Priest : And we say together with them, Thou art holy, and wonderful is the holiness of Thy glory, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Truly He alone is Thy Son, and Thou alone truly art His Father.

12. His birth from Thee is Unsearchable. As Thine existence has no beginning, so Thy Son has neither beginning nor end, and as Thy days have no beginning His days also have no beginning.

13. None sits at Thy right hand except Thy Son born from Thee, and none sits on Thy throne but Thine image Who is like Thee and is Thy likeness.

14. He is Thy Son and the messenger of Thy counsel, Thy beloved Who is of Thee, Thine image, Thine appearance, Thy mind, Thy power, Thy wisdom, Thy counsel, Thy right-hand, and Thine arm; He is true God from Thine essence, the truly only-begotten Son.

15. He was born from Thine essence, the Word perfect in all, Who is Thine image born from Thee and equal to Thee; He is like Thee high and wonderful.

16. Angels and archangels worship Him; through Thy love for man Thou sent Him to us because Thou has loved us.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

17. Humbling Himself He redeemed us. He who was born from Thee and is like Thee was born from us in our likeness which is in Thine image.

18. He, who is perfect like Thee and is Thine image, walked among us in our image.

19. He told us about Thy being, and was made flesh like us. He who overawes the seraphim from the highest heaven suffered at His own will.

20. We saw Him and despised Him Who is great before Thee. He is the glorious Lord among us, yet He is hidden from the watchful. Truly He appeared, and was born openly of our nature.

21. He resembles Thee in image and appearance, was made man, came in the likeness of our flesh, lived among us in our image, and He is glorious like Thee.

22. He flew and descended unto us, and suffered insult as we do. He flew and ascended unto Thee and He is honourable as Thou art.

23. He, to Whom the watchful give thanks in heaven, was crowned with a crown of thorns and was crucified on the tree of the cross with thieves. He, before Whom the high ones bow their heads in awe, bowed his head before the crucifiers to suffer.

24. A weak tree carried Him who carries heaven and earth. A narrow grave contained Him, before whom heaven and earth tremble, when He was buried in it.

25. Him who gathered the ends of earth in His palm and held the seas of the world in the hollow of His hand__ they wrapped with linen cloths and buried in a grave of three cubits. He stretched forth His honourable head and the grave was filled with Him.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

26. He rose from the dead on the third day and entered where His disciples were, while the door was closed, and then departed from His disciples.

27. While He was there, His glory covered the heavens. He ascended into heaven, sat at the right hand of His Father, heaven became His throne and the earth His footstool.

28. He will come again to judge the living and the dead, He will thunder above and His voice will shake the foundations of the earth, and the dead will come out unto Him from their graves, to Whom be glory and honour, together with His Father and the Holy Spirit, unto the ages of ages.

29. Deacon : Look to the east.

30. Priest : Yea, Lord, it is Thou Who raises all by Thy word, who raised the dead through Thy death. There are among the unbelievers those who believed in Thy cross, there are among the sinners those who returned through Thy death, there are among the unclean those who were sanctified through Thy suffering, there are among the dead those whom Thou raised through Thy resurrection, and among those who were gathered together to judge Thee there were those who believed in Thee.

31. Thou did open the iron gate and will raise those whose bodies waxed old in the grave, and will awaken those who fell asleep in their life time, and will raise those lying in the earth, and will set free the slaves of sin, and will justify through Thy mercy those who were defiled

32. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (to be chanted thrice)

(1) Hab. 3:3.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

33. Priest : Through Thy mercy Thou reconciles the heretics, strengthens with Thy word those who return to Thee, causes the heretics to return that they may walk in Thy way, gathers the scattered to enter into Thy paradise.

34. Those among Thy people who committed sin Thou causes to return unto Thy faith.

35. O Lord, Thou strengthens the weak in spirit that all who live on earth may know that Thou art God and know Thy Son Jesus Christ Whom Thou sent, Thy beloved Son Whom Thou loves and who was born from Thee. Glory be to Thee with Him and with the invisible Holy Spirit, unto the ages of ages.

36. Deacon : Let us give heed.

37. Priest : We offer before Thee this pure and holy offering for the sake of Abel Seth, Enoch, and Melchisedec, for the sake of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, for the sake of Moses, Aaron and all the prophets.

38. For the sake of Simon Peter, John the Baptist and all the apostles.

39. For the sake of David, Hezekiah, Josiah, King Constantine and all the kings who have gone to their rest in the true faith.

40. For the sake of all the bishops, priests, deacons, assistant deacons, anagnosts, young men and virgins.

41. For the sake of all souls in which the Holy Spirit dwelt and to which the perfect Spirit of life was given.

For the sake of all creatures formed after the likeness of our Lord Jesus Christ Whom Thou loves.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

ed after the likeness of our Lord Jesus Christ Thy dear Son Whom Thou Loves.

42. For the sake of all holy men for whom this offering has been prepared and whom they (1) have led unto Thy holy church and have drawn near before Thy great and holy altar.

43. For the sake of all travelers, and wanderers on the face of the whole earth in true faith, and for the sake of those who have departed from this world (2).

44. For the sake of every mouth and tongue which believed in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ Thy dear Son Whom Thou loves.

Glory be to Thee with Him and with the invisible Holy Spirit, unto the ages of ages.

45. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles: #6-9, p. 43).

46. At this time he shall mention the names of those who have recently fallen asleep.

47. The assistant priest shall say "The Prayer of Benediction." (Anaphora of the Apostles: #10-21, pp. 43-44).

48. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

49. Priest : For the sake of those and all our Lord and God Jesus Christ, Thy church worships Thee and Thy bride exalts Thee with the goodness of the high ones, with the sanctification of the seraphim, with the praise of the cherubim, with the thanksgiving of the angels, with the prayer of the watchful and with the perfection of the saints :

50. With the purity of Adam, with the sacrifice of Noah, with the hospitality of Abraham, with the kindness of Isaac and with the vision of Jacob :

51. With the imprisonment of Joseph, with the patience of Job, with the meekness of Moses and with the praise of Elijah :

52. With the love of the apostles, with the prayer of the saints, with the labour of the anchorites, with the righteousness of the sinless, and with the humility of the pure :

53. With the courage of the pure, with the bereavement of the bereaved, and with the righteousness of the perfect saints :

54. With the remoteness of the ends of the earth; with the depth of the sea's whirlpools, with the flash of lightning, and with the flight of the clouds :

55. With the thanksgiving of the angels, with the glory of the saints, with the purity of the watchful, with the agreement of the high ones, and with the light of the spiritual ones :

56. With the right hand of the priests, with the death of the martyrs, with the blood of the believers, and with the greatness of the luminous angels :

57. With the striking of Thy Son, with the suffering of Thine only One, and with Thine authority which holds all :

58. And with the prayer which ascends to the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

(1) i.e. either the authority given to them, or the right hand with which they prepare the Holy Communion.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

59. At this time he shall offer incense.

People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom.

60. Priest : In the same night in which they betrayed Him:

61. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

62. Priest : He took bread in His holy, blessed and spotless hands, looked up unto heaven, towards Thee, His Father.

63. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

64. Priest : Gave thanks, blessed, broke (+ three times, then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation). And said unto them, Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body which will be broken for you as a propitiation for all the world for the remission of sin.

65. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.
We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God; that this is He we truly believe.

66. Priest : Again after they had supped, He took a cup, gave thanks, blessed, hallowed (+ three times) and said unto His disciples, Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood of the new testament which will be shed for you and given as a propitiation for all the world for the remission of sin.

He shall move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

67. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

68. Priest : Yea, Lord our God,

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

hearken to the prayer of Thy servants and accept those who worship Thee before Thy face.

69. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection; we believe thy ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee, and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

70. Priest : Let the flaming sword of fire, called "Shining"¹ be drawn, and let the heaven of heavens be opened, through Thy righteousness, and with Thy will, let Thy living Holy Spirit descend, come and rest upon this bread and cup, bless and sanctify them to be the communion of the body and blood of Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ (+ once over the bread and once over the cup and once more over both of them) for the forgiveness of the iniquity to those who draw near to it and remission of sin to those who partake of it.

71. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

72. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that he grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

73. People : As it was, is, and shall be unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

74. At this time he shall dip his finger into the Blood and sign the Body.

Priest : And to all those who in true faith partake of it and receive it may it be for mercy, compassion, healing, help, life of soul and body, forgiveness of iniquity, remission of sin, resurrection from the dead, and new life, unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

75. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee forever.

The people shall repeat his words.

76. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

77. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

78. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

79. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Again we beseech the almighty God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, O Lord, we have lifted up our eyes unto Thee desiring the descent of the Holy Spirit, we kneel to Thee with the knees of our heart, and we bow unto Thee the heads of our minds and spirits.

80. O Lord, sanctify us with Thy sanctification, and purify us through Thy mercy, and make us worthy to partake of Thy holy mystery.

81. Let not this coal of fire, which we have laid before Thee upon Thy holy altar, be our accuser, and let not this bread of worship which we break be for vengeance because we did not purify our soul and our body.

82. It is fearful to open the lips to eat burning fire and swallow glowing coal, if the belly is not purified from deceit.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

83. It is fearful to see the slaughter of the pure bridegroom in his pavilion.

84. It is fearful to see the killing of the Son of the living God before His heavenly Father.

85. It is fearful to draw near the flame of the Deity and to touch the lightning of glory.

86. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven .

..

(see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

87. Priest : Let us, therefore, purify ourselves to take it and sanctify our souls to receive it and say :

Glory be to the Father who has been pleased that the pure fatted calf may be killed.

Glory be to the Son who is the pure fatted Calf.

Glory be to the Holy Spirit Who has made this bread the flesh of the pure fatted Calf.

Three names and one God,

Three likenesses¹ and one appearance,

Three persons and one essence.

88. Worthy is He to be glorified by the mouths of the watchful angels, worthy is He to be sanctified by the mouths of the prophets and apostles from now till the end of the world and till the second advent.

89. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world, and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith that is of Him, let us let us submit ourselves to Christ.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

90. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

91. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

92.) Priest : The Father was with His Son and the Holy Spirit before there were hours and days, before there were months and years.

93. The One was not before the Other, and the Second was not before the Third. How swift is the speed of lightning (1) and how swift is the movement of eagles' (2) wings.

94. They are united without separation, connected without being mixed, They live in Trinity, They are joined in oneness, equal in persons and similar in light and appearance.

95. The Father did not beget His Son to help Him in His work before the world was created, and the existence of the Holy Spirit is not to contribute wisdom and work.

96. Let us speak of His birth from God the Father only. In that instance He had no mother because the existence of the creatures had not yet appeared. Again, let us speak of and proclaim the birth of Him Who is alone the Son of God, and, Who alone was born without an earthly Father from the Virgin, the daughter of David.

97. His humanity was not inferior because He had no Father to be born of his seed, but was perfectly incarnate from a virgin only.

98. As Eve's female nature was not inferior through having had no mother when she was formed from the bone of Adam's side, and as the building of the body of the first Adam did not lose anything when a bone of his side was taken away, so also the seal of Mary's virginity was not destroyed when she gave birth to the Father of Adam in the flesh;

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

99. And as Adam did not feel pain when a bone was taken from his side, also the Galilean Mother of God did not feel travail.

100. Thus we believe and thus we affirm that this bread which we break is the body of Christ which He took from the daughter of the Hebrews.

101. We also believe that this cup is the blood of the Deity shed from the side of God's Lamb. We also believe that this sign of the cross is the image of Christ's crucifixion when He was stretched out at the time of His suffering.

102. We bow before the altar of Him who is clothed with a vesture dipped in blood and before that vesture dipped in blood, unto the ages of ages.

103. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

104. Priest : Prayer of Penitence (Anaphora of the Apostles, #72 - 88: pp. 47 - 48).

105. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

106. Priest : The Lord be with all of you

(1) i.e. the Trinity. (2) i.e. the angels.

(1) Rev. 19 : 13.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

People : And with your spirit.

107. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hands and say: Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant)

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

108. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

109. Priest : shall turn to the people and say : Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles 95 - 96: p. 49; and then 97-138: pp. 49 - 53)

110. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : Pilot of the Soul.

Then was our mouth filled with laughter and our tongue with singing, we who have received this indistructible mystery.

111. O Lord, that which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, neither has it entered into the heart of man, Thou has prepared, O God, for them that love Thy holy Name; and has revealed unto us tiny infants in Thy holy church : even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight, because Thou art compassionate, O Lord our God¹.

113. Priest : To Thee we send, unto the highest heaven, glory and honour, Father, Son and the Holy Spirit, both now and ever and unto endless ages.

People : Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. CYRIL

114. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

O Lord, make us, we whom Thou has called and sanctified, worthy of Thy call, keep us through Thy love, and strengthen us in hallowing Thee.

115. Keep us far from every evil and save us with Thy right hand in Thine eternal kingdom, through Christ Thy Son, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

1 The Anaphora of Jacob (2), Bishop of Serough ; may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King , Queen, President . . .) unto the ages of ages. Amen.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. feast days of the angels.
- b. the five or six days of the short month, Pagomin (September 5 - 10/11): days of special anticipation of the Lord's second advent.
- c. fifth Sunday in Lent.
- d. 27th. Sene (July 4) the memorial day of his death.

(2) He is one of the best Syriac authors, one of his biographers called him "The flute of the Spirit and the Harp of the Believing Church." He was born in 451 at Kurtam, a village on the Euphrates to the west of Harran, and was probably educated at Edessa. At an early age he attracted the attention of his countrymen by his piety and his literary gifts. Once ordained to the priesthood, he became perieutes or episcopal visitor of Haura, in Serough, not far from his birth place. In 519, at the age of 68, he was made bishop of Batnan, another town in the district of Serough, but lived only till November 521. He wrote 760 metrical homilies, besides expositions, letters, and various hymns.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

3. Priest : Stand up in the fear of God, open the windows of your ears that you may attend, and awaken your hearts. Our being here in this place is not in vain. God sees and examines every one of us.

4. Let us draw near and offer our prayer to God remembering the ancient fathers who gained their rest in the right faith; and we begin from the present honourable father, the Patriarch Abba (_____) and his fellow, Archbishop Abba (_____).

5. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed . . . (Anaphora Of The Apostles, # 6 - 9: p. 43)

6. The assistant priest shall say "The Prayer of Benediction." (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 10 - 21: pp.43, 44)

7. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons, and all the Christian people.

8. Priest : Rest the souls of these and all those whose names have or have not been called, and those on behalf of whom this good memorial has been made before Thee, and have mercy upon them

9. Thou Who sent Thy Son from heaven into the womb of the Virgin to fulfill Thy will:

10. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

11. Priest : To Him, to Thy Son, Thou did grant authority to judge heaven and earth, even so, He had the authority before the world was created.

12. Deacon : Look to the east.

13. Priest : How profound is the greatness of Thine only One, and of His honour, humility, patience with might.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

14. Deacon : Let us give heed.

15. Priest : To Him, to Thy Beloved bow the angels, archangels, ten thousand times ten thousand, and every name¹ under heaven and on earth.

16. The hosts of Michael in their tribes, and the hosts of Gabriel in their congregation, the cherubim in their might, and the seraphim in their sanctification, and all the hosts of angels in their ranks glorify God Who is glorified with the glory of the saints.

17. Deacon : Answer ye.

18. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

19. Priest : Let us also say together with them, Holy, holy, holy, Lord, Thou art truly our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, holy in Thy holiness, great in Thy greatness, praised in Thy thanksgiving and glorified with the glory of Thy holy angels.

20. O Lord, He Who begot Thee resembles Thee in image and appearance, Thou was sent by Thy Father, and Thou art a spring, from the spring, sprung from heaven.

21. Thou art the long cord that will not be severed from the Father. Thou art the creator of heaven and earth. Thou came down from heaven by Thy will. The womb of the Virgin contained Thee. A little daughter, who was the daughter of the poor, carried Thee. The Galilean embraced Thee. Thou did sanctify her soul, purify her body, and strengthen her so she was not afraid of Thee.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

22. Thou was born at Bethlehem and Thou appeared like a man. Thou was baptized by John, walked on the sea, rebuked the winds and quickened souls.

23. Thou joined Thy disciples in the celebration of Hosanna, satisfied many people with five loaves and two fishes through the power of Thy divinity.

24. O Lord Who cannot be affronted, Thou was affronted by Judas, Thou was reviled by Ananias, disdained by Caiaphas, examined by Pilate and was numbered with the sinners.

25. At that time, on Friday, the evil Jews crucified Thee on the tree of the cross in the likeness of this sign of the cross which we make raising our hands over this table.

26. O Lord, Thou was struck with the hands of a servant, beaten with sticks, pierced with a spear, and they caused Thee to drink bitter gall with vinegar. While Thou was God, able to prevent them, Thou did not prevent them, Thou became patient even to death; all this Thou accepted for the love of man.

27. Thou rose from the dead and raised the dead, Thou did lead captivity captive to be presented to Thy Father. Being clothed in flesh Thou ascended to heaven, Thy accustomed position, through the power of divinity.

28. O Lord, pity Thy people and remember Thy covenant for the sake of Thy beloved Abraham, Thy servant Isaac and Thy holy Israel whom Thou called in Thy name.¹

29. O Lord, for the sake of the holy prophets, for the sake of the apostles, preachers, for the sake of the ordained priests, for the sake of the victorious martyrs, for the sake of the blessed righteous, and for the sake of the patient virgins and monks.

30. O Lord, for the sake of these four Evangelists, the likeness of those throne bearers abiding in heaven :¹

31. Matthew in the likeness of a man, who preached Thy birth in flesh from the seed of David starting from the patriarch of the ancient fathers :

32. Mark in the likeness of a roaring lion, who propagated Thy preaching to the Egyptians in the Orthodox faith.

33. Luke in the likeness of an ox, who preached Thy humility, Thy lying among asses and oxen, Thy being wrapped in swaddling cloths and Thy dwelling in a stable with the Virgin, Thy mother.

34. John in the likeness of an eagle flying high and crying aloud, who interprets the nature of the Deity, and who is the sea of wisdom and the depth of prophecy.

35. It is Thou who chose Him from among His fellows and decorated Him with holiness and girded Him with Thy girdle of virginity to be blameless like the angels.

36. O Lord, what mouth, what lips, what tongue can praise Thine exaltation?

At this time he shall raise incense.

37. People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom (Anaphora of the Apostles, #34: p.45)

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

38. Priest : Glory be to Thee, thanksgiving to Thy kingdom, power to Thy Father, honour and glory with dominion to the Holy Spirit Who is equal with and not inferior to Thee, and to Him who begot Thee, unto endless ages.

39. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

40. Priest : Thou did take bread in Thy holy hands to give to Thy pure disciples.

At this time he shall raise the Bread.

41. People : We believe that this is he, truly we believe.

42. Priest : O Thou Who did bless at that time, now bless this (pointing) bread with blessing. (+ three times)

43. O Thou Who did break at that time with thanksgiving, now break this (pointing) bread.

Then he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

44. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God; that this is He we truly believe.

45. Priest : Thou also mixed the cup of wine with water to give to Thy pure disciples.

46. O Thou Who sanctified at that time, now sanctify this (Pointing) cup. (+ three times)

47. O Thou Who did grant at that time, now grant this cup. (He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.)

48. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

49. Priest : O Thou Who did unite at that time, now unite this bread with this (pointing) cup to be Thy body and Thy blood. (At this time he shall dip his finger into the blood and sign the Body).

50. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection : we believe Thine ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

51. Deacon : Let your heart be in heaven.

52. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (to be chanted thrice)

53. Priest : Let the gate of light be opened and the doors of glory be unlocked (1) and the curtain before the face of the Father be withdrawn, and let the Lamb of God descend and sit on this (pointing) holy table prepared before me, Thy servant. Let "Melos," the fearful sword of fire be sent and appear over this (pointing) bread and cup : (+ once over the bread, once over the cup, and once more over both) to fulfill this offering.

54. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

55. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

56. People : As it was, is, and shall be unto generations of generations, and endless ages.

57. Priest : Grant it together unto all them that take of it, that it may be unto them for life and for remission of sin.

(1) See Anaphora of The Three Hundred, #113.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

58. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

59. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

60. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

61. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

62. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

Again we supplicate thee, O Lover of man, and we serve Thee in all things and for all things, and let not Thy body and blood accuse anyone of us because of the impurity of our soul and body.

63. As Thy body was stretched on the cross up and down, right and left, like the corners of the earth, for the life of all the world, so also we hold and see this sign of the cross on this bread ; and let it not be for accusation and destruction to anyone who partakes of it.

64. O Lord, how clearly Thou knows the foolishness of man, none has been found who has not transgressed Thy commandment from the first Adam till the present days, because Thou, Lord our God, art far from anger, plenteous in mercy, and righteous.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

65. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven. .

(see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

66. Priest : Truly, I offer prayer according to the first order given by God that Moses and Aaron, the priests, might pray on behalf of Thy people and inheritance.

67. Like them I pray unto Thee on behalf of Thy people and inheritance who have come into Thy church, priests and deacons, and on behalf of Thy people and inheritance who are outside. If there is here anyone of the priests or the people whose mind is far from Thee, let Thy will overwhelm him.

68. As Thou has gathered this bread which had been scattered on the mountains and the little hills, in the forests and the valleys, and being gathered together, it became one bread for oblation. (1)

69. People : The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world, stand before the Saviour of the world, and the angels encircle the Saviour of the world, Whose curtain is fire for the sake of His holy body and His precious blood.

Let us draw near before His face to enter into the house of the holiness of the Saviour of the world and to live believing in Him and trusting in Him.

70. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

71. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

72. Priest : Truly we bow and serve Thee Who sits in the highest heaven which neither the mind of man nor the knowledge of angels can reach.

1) See Anaphora of John Son of Thunder, #91, and Anaphora of St. Gregory II, #27: p. 165.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

73. We supplicate the kindness of Thy goodness on behalf of Thy people and Thine inheritance who have today come unto Thy sanctuary, the priests and deacons who have bowed their heads before Thine majesty, to receive Thy body and Thy blood by the hand of me, Thy servant, whom Thou has called through Thy grace, though unfit, unworthy and pitiable.

74. This is the covenant of Thy word which Thou uttered to the priests saying, "You are the salt of the earth;" Thou said to the priests, "You are the light of the world;" Thou said to the priests, "You are the eyes of the house of God."

Thou said to the priests, "You are the candles of the church;" Thou said to the priests, "You are the likeness of the angels." Come, O High Priest Jesus Christ, to bless Thy people and Thine inheritance, unto the ages of ages.

75. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

76. People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

77. Priest : "Prayer of Penitence"
(Anaphora of the Apostles, # 72 - 88: pp. 47 - 48)

78. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

79. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

80. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hand and say : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant)

THE ANAPHORA OF
ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

*The people shall repeat his words.
Then he shall repeat them three times and the people twice.*

81. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

82. Then he shall turn to the people and say

Priest : Lord our God . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 95-138: pp. 47 - 53)

83. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : “Pilot of the soul” :

O Creator of lights, Who did cast away the darkness and degrade the idols and destroyed death through Thy death

84. We supplicate the kindness of Thy goodness on behalf of Thy people and Thine inheritance who have come unto Thy sanctuary to receive Thy body and Thy blood from thy honourable table which is the hope of sinners.

85. Keep them, by day, from trespassing and from error of sight and of the bodily members, and keep them by night that the vain thoughts thereof, which destroy the soul may not come unto them.

86. When they sleep let the wings of the angels cover them in order that oversleeping, which is the likeness of death, may not overwhelm them. O Lord, awaken them through Thy love to glorify Thine honourable and strong name, almighty Lord our God.

Deacon : Pray ye.

87. Priest : O Lord, this corruptible and transient world of hoping is not for us, Thy Christian people; but we hope and wait for that which is to come.

THE ANAPHORA OF
ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

88. Because Thou said, “Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away (1).”

89. Thou also said, The horn will be blown three times to awaken the dead;

90. At the first blowing of the horn there will be gathered the dust of bodies scattered through all the ends of the world, above and beneath, in the sea and on the land, that which is in the stomachs of the beasts and that which waxed old and perished after death, and the pieces of the body, fallen on earth, will be gathered in their previous position. (2)

91. At the second blowing of the horn the bones will be joined with the flesh and blood and they will be perfect dead bodies without movement until the appointed time.

92. At the third blowing of the horn the dead will rise in the twinkling of an eye, (3) the righteous and the sinners, carrying their works which followed them from the earth and which they did in all the days of their life, good or bad. Thou wilt make the righteous to stand at Thy right hand, and the sinners at Thy left hand.

93. Thou wilt answer Thine elect with the words of blessing saying, “Come to me, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom of heaven prepared for you from the foundation of the world :

For I was an hungry, and ye gave me food:

I was thirsty, and you gave me drink:

I was a stranger, and you took me in:

I was naked, and you clothed me:

I was sick, and you visited me:

I was in prison, and you came unto me and spoke on my behalf.

(1) Matt. 24:35 (2) Ezek.. 37:7 + (3) 1Cor. 15:52

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

94. Afterwards Thou will turn to Thy left hand and rebuke the sinners with the word of accusation saying, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his angels

For I was an hungry, and you gave me no food

I was thirsty, and you gave me no drink
I was a stranger, and you did not take me in

I was naked, and you did not clothe me
I was sick, and you did not visit me
I was in prison, and you spoke not on my behalf.

95. At that time every mouth and tongue which spoke misbelief and deceit will be stopped. At that time there will be sorrow but vain sorrow.

96. At that time there will be a cry, but a vain cry : at that time there will be wailing, but vain wailing; at that time there will be lamentation, but vain lamentation ; at that time tears will be shed like the water of winter, which has no end and does not stop. There will be sent to them swift lightning and a fearful sound of thunder and a powerful flash which cuts, separates and divides_ this is the portion of sinners.

97. At that time, the earth will restore that which was entrusted to it and the mother will not hear the cry of her daughter. At that time there will be revealed the work of the soul, which she did during all the days of her life.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

98. We have trusted on Thy body which we have eaten and Thy blood which we have drunk that Thou at that time may have compassion and mercy upon us, because Thou said, "Whoever eats My flesh, and drinks My blood, has eternal life."

99. We have also trusted on Thy Mother our Lady Mary, the shield of our race in giving birth to Thee, because Thou told her, that whoever remembers you and calls upon your name will have eternal life.

100. We have also trusted on the archangels, the persecution of the prophets, the preaching of the apostles, the right hand of the priests, the blood of the martyrs, the patience of the young men, virgins and monks, and on the faith of the faithful men and women.

101. At that time have compassion, pity and mercy upon us. Glory be to the Father who sent, thanksgiving be to the Son who was sent, and honour and glory be to the life-giving Holy Spirit, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

102. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

God has authority in power and name, and there is no name like His under the four foundations,(1) and over the seven heavens. It is He Who created all, visible, and invisible, known and unknown, palpable and impalpable, hidden and open, above and beneath.

(1) Earth, water, fire and wind.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. JACOB OF SEROUGH

103. He created all, even Adam the handiwork of God, without being wearied.

104. And now, O Lord, our God and Saviour Jesus Christ, we pray Thee and beseech Thee on behalf of those who have bowed their heads before Thee to dismiss them :

105. Make their infants to grow, let their adults come to their full stature, support their aged ones, strengthen their feeble ones, keep their women, and let their children be entrusted to Thee.

106. Satisfy their hungry ones, give drink to their thirsty ones, clothe their naked ones, give rest to their troubled ones, comfort their sad ones, and gladden their sorrowful ones.

107. Give life to their sick, heal their diseased, give light to the eyes of their blind, make the ears of their deaf hear, loosen their prisoners and give freedom to their captives.

108. Purify their bodies, sanctify their souls, and when they go back to their homes, O Lord, guide that they may reach them, feed them and lift them up for ever. ¹

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS ⁽¹⁾

1. The Anaphora of St. Dioscorus, may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King, Queen, President . . .), unto the ages of ages. Amen.
2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.
3. Priest : From before the world and ever after, God is in His Trinity, God is in his divinity, and God is in His kingdom.

(1) This Anaphora is celebrated on the following occasions:

- a. Christ's Nativity.
- b. Epiphany.
- c. Christ's Resurrection (Fasika).
- d. Ascension day.
- e. Pentecost day.
- f. Seventh day of every month, the Feast of Trinity.
- g. 7th Meskerem. (September 17). the memorial day of the death of St. Dioscorus.

(2) Dioscorus, the 25th Patriarch of Alexandria, was one of the great leaders of the church who fought the good fight at the Council of Chalcedon. Having attended that Council he challenged the formula which claimed that "Christ had two natures after the Incarnation." In his defence he said "I have passages from the Fathers Athanasius, Gregory, and Cyril, to the effect that after the Incarnation there were not two natures, but one incarnate nature of the Word. As a result, the Emperor Marcian banished him to Gangra where he lived quietly without ever returning to his own country, and where he died on 7th Meskerem (September 17) 451 A.D.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

4. Before the dawn and the morning, before day and night, and before the creation of the angels, God was in His kingdom.
5. Before the heavens were stretched out, before the face of the earth appeared, and before the green plants were produced, God was in His kingdom.
6. Before the sun, the moon, the stars, and before the motion of lights, God was in His kingdom.
7. Before the moving beasts, the flying birds, and before the beasts of the sea, God was in His kingdom.
8. Before He created Adam after His image and likeness and before Adam transgressed His commandment, God was in His kingdom.
9. Glory be to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages.
10. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 6 - 9: p. 43)
11. Asst. Priest : Prayer of Benediction. (Anaphora of the Apostles, #10 - 21: p. 43 - 44).
12. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.
13. Priest : Let heaven hear, the earth listen; and the foundations of the earth be afraid.
14. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.
15. Priest : The Lord came down through the will of His Father, sojourned in Mary and was born while she was a pure virgin.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

16. Deacon : Look to the east.

17. Priest : He was laid in the manger of the cattle, received the presents of His kingdom, and wept as infants do, asking for food from the breasts of His mother.

18. He walked openly and appeared like a man, grew little by little and was baptized in Jordan at the age of thirty.

19. Deacon : Let us give heed.

20. Priest : He stayed in the wilderness as a fasting man, was tempted by the Devil and He degraded the rulers of darkness through the power of His divinity.

21. Deacon : Answer me.

22. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

23. Priest : Holy, holy, holy God in his Trinity ; being a king, He showed His humility like a servant. (at this time he shall offer incense)

24. People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom . . . (Anaphora of the Apostles 34: p. 45)

25. Priest : He who created man stretched forth His hands for suffering to set free Adam from the yoke of sin.

26. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

27. Priest : In the same night in which they betrayed Him, He took bread in His holy, blessed and spotless hands.

At this time he shall raise the Host.

28. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

29. Priest : He looked Up to heaven towards Thee, His Father, gave thanks, blessed and broke (+ three times).

At this time he shall indent the Host lightly with his thumb in five places without separation.

and He gave to His holy disciples and His pure apostles and said unto them Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body which will be broken for you for the remission of sin.

30. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God ; that this is He we truly believe.

31. Priest : Again. He mixed water with wine, gave thanks, blessed, hallowed (+ three times) and gave it to His holy disciples and his pure apostles and said unto them Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood which will be shed for you as a propitiation for many.

He shall then move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

32. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

33. Priest : The Jews took hold of Him and made Him stand in the court, Him before Whom the hosts of angels stand in fear and trembling.

34. They crucified Him on the tree, nailed Him with nails, beat Him on the head with sticks, pierced His side with a spear, to Him Who gave drink to the Israelites from a rock, they gave to drink gall mixed with myrrh in His thirst.

35. The immortal died, died to destroy death, died to quicken the dead as He had promised them with the word of covenant.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

36. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection; we believe Thine ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify Thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

37. Priest : They took Him down from the tree, wrapped Him in linen cloths, and buried Him in a new grave.

38. He rose from the dead on the third day, and entered where His disciples were gathered and appeared to them in the upper room of Zion, and when He ascended unto heaven on the fortieth day He ordered them saying, "Wait for the promise of the Father." (1)

39. On the fiftieth day, He sent to them the Holy Spirit in the likeness of fire (2), and they spoke in the languages of all countries ; so also, as Thou did with them, send the Holy Spirit over this (pointing) bread and this (pointing) cup to make them the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, unto the ages of ages. (+ once over the Bread, once over the Cup, and once more over Both) as Thou said, "He that eats My flesh, and drinks My blood, dwells in Me, and I in him." (2)

40. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

41. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God to grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

42. People : As it was, is, and shall be unto generations of generations and endless ages

43. At this time he shall dip his

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

finger into the Blood and sign the Body.

Priest : Grant it together unto all Thy people that it may be unto them for life and for purification from sin, unto endless ages.

44. Priest : Grant us to be united through Thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in Thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

45. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

46. Priest : Send the grace of the holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

47. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

48. Priest : The Prayer of Fraction.

Where is the country of wisdom, where is its abode . . . (Anaphora of St. Epiphanius, #76-95: pp. 132 - 134)

49. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (to be repeated thrice)

The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him let us submit ourselves to Christ.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

50. Asst. Deacon : ‘Open ye the gates, princes.

51. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow your heads.

52. Priest : Let the Lamb come so that we may see Him with our eyes, immolate Him with our hands and rejoice in Him. May His body be joined with this bread, and may His blood be poured into this cup.

53. Let none of us think when he eats of this (pointing) bread that he eats mere flesh without blood and Spirit. Let none of us think when he drinks of this (pointing) cup that he drinks mere blood without body and Spirit, but one is the body, blood and Spirit as His divinity became one with His humanity unto the ages of ages. (1)

54. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, do we worship and Thee do we glorify.

55. Priest : “Prayer of Penitence” (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 72 - 88: pp.)

56. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

57. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

58. At this time the priest shall lift up the whole Host with his hand and say : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three time in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant)

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

The people shall repeat his words.

Then the priest shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

59. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

60. Priest : shall turn to the people and say: Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles #95-103, again 104 - 138)

61. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : Pilot of the Soul : Again we supplicate the almighty God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, because He neither disdained nor refused our supplication, nor did He remove His mercy from us, because the Lord our God is merciful.

Deacon : Pray ye.

62. Priest :

Yea Lord, Thou art the God of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the King of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Almighty.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Governor of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Saviour of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Judge of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Life-giver of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Keeper of all.

Yea Lord, Thou art the Nourisher of all.

63. As Thou did join the body of Thy Son with our body, and Thou did mix the blood of Thy Messiah with our blood, so put Thy fear in our heart and the beauty of Thy worship in our mind.

(I) Anaphora of St. Athanasius, #150-153 and Anaphora of St. Epiphanius 99, 100.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. DIOSCORUS

64. We, who are carnal, mind the things of the flesh and do the works of the flesh and walk in the way of the flesh. But do Thou teach us the work of the Spirit, make us understand the law of the Spirit, and lead us to the way of the Spirit. (1)

65. Because if Thou pity us, we sinners, then Thou will be called compassionate. Thou pities the righteous because of their works and does recompense them according to their righteousness.

66. Remember not against us former iniquities : let Thy tender mercies, O God, speedily precede us. (2)

67. Towards Thee we cry, towards Thee we weep, Thee we entreat, unto endless ages.

People : Amen (3).

68. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

O eternal God, light of life unquenchable, look upon Thy servants and handmaids and plant in their hearts the fear of Thy name, in order that they may bear fruit in blessing; and count them with those to whom have been given Thy body and blood.

69. And let Thy hand rest upon them who have bowed their heads before Thee, Thy people, men and women, aged and children, virgins and monks, widows and orphans.

70. And join us also with them, protect, help, confirm, and strengthen us with the strength of Thine archangels; from all evil works keep us apart and in all good works unite us.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II⁽¹⁾

1. The Anaphora of St. Gregory II (2) ; may his prayer and blessing be with our (head of state: King, Queen, President . . .), unto the ages of ages.

2. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give ye thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Lift up your hearts.

People : We have lifted them up unto the Lord our God.

3. Priest : We thank Thee, Lord, we glorify Thee and praise Thee.

Thy name is blessed, and we bless Thee.

Thy name is praised, and we praise Thee.

(1) This is celebrated during the period from Christmas to the Fast of Nineveh, and at Hosenna (Palm Sunday).

(2) He was born in 233 at Neo-Caesarea in Pontus, the same city of which he was later bishop. While he was quite young he began the study of law. Arriving at Caesareea, in Palestine, on the way to Berytus, where he and his brother Athenodorus were to attend a school of law, they met Origen, and were so impressed that they remained in Caesarea five years and studied logic, physics, mathematics, ethics, Greek philosophy and theology with him. Then, the brothers returned to Pontus, and afterwards were made bishops, Gregory of Neo-Caesarea, his native place; Athenodorus of some unknown city. Gregory is called 'Thaumaturgus' (wonder-worker) because of the many miracles God did at his hands. He died on 21st Hedar (November 30) 270 A. D.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

4. Thou art more terrible than the terrible, Thy greatness is unspeakable, Thou art glorious and we glorify Thee.

5. Thou art above the saints, Thy glory is wonderful, thousand thousands of angels hallow Thee, the watchful who do not sleep glorify Thee.

6. The eight terrible ones (1) who desire to draw near unto Thee flee away because of the flame of fire for they may not draw near unto Thee. They fear and are afraid because of the coal of fire which goes out from Thy mouth. All of them together sanctify and praise Thee with one voice.

7. And we also, thy humble servants, do also like them, stretching forth our hands, raising them up in the sign of the cross, and glorify Thee and praise Thee. But those, the seraphim and cherubim, have wings, each has six wings.

8. Deacon : Ye that are sitting, stand up.

9. Priest : All of them together hallow Thee and praise Thee with one voice, one with the other, this with that, the other with the other, and say Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts.

10. Deacon : Answer ye.

11. People : Holy, holy, holy, perfect Lord of hosts, heaven and earth are full of the holiness of Thy glory.

12. Priest : He is covered with the curtain of clouds. The Saviour was born from a holy virgin. The Lord appeared and the true Sun of righteousness arose.

(1) Eight unidentified angels appeared to St. Gregory .

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

13. We believe in the Father Who sent, and in the Son Who was sent, and we believe in the Holy Spirit, the life-giver.

14. And we say that He Who destroyed death and broke the iron chains rose from the dead and raised the dead and, descending into Hades, He loosened the prisoners and preached liberty to them.

15. Deacon : Look to the east.

16. Priest : We thank Thee and glorify Thee, Thou who removes darkness and gives light and art the true Saviour, because through Thy Son's love and Thy love He gave His body in that night.

17. Deacon : Let us give heed.

18. Priest : Though He was God, all this came upon Him; when they seized Him, He Himself bore the spitting of the unclean and bore all the woes of the prison house.

19. All these things He carried though He was Lord and God, He carried all on our behalf: on behalf of the poor and needy, on behalf of the prophets and apostles, on behalf of the martyrs and faithful,

20. On behalf of the bishops and priests, on behalf of the deacons and anagnosts, on behalf of the widows and orphans, on behalf of the virgins, monks and young men,

21. On behalf of the sinners and the scattered; so that He may gather the scattered, justify the sinners, bring back the wicked and declare His resurrection.

22. O Lord, we speak of those whose names we know, but Thou knows those whose names we do not know and Thou understands them, and everything is naked before Thee.

23. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 6-9: p. 43)

24. Asst. Priest : Prayer of Benediction. (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 10-21: pp. 43, 44.)

25. Asst. Deacon : Lord, pity and have mercy upon the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons and all the Christian people.

26. Priest : (We speak) of these and all through our Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ, Thy beloved Son Whom Thou has loved and Whom Thou did send before.

27. As Thou has gathered this bread which had been scattered on the mountains and the little hills, and being gathered together it became one whole bread, so also gather us, through Thy divinity, from all evil thoughts into perfect faith (1).

28. And as Thou did unite water with wine, and wine was united with water, and after having been united and mixed it is impossible for the one to be separated from the other, so also gather us, through Thy divinity, from all evil thoughts into perfect faith.

29. At this time he shall offer incense.

People : Remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 34: p. 45)

30. Priest : And unite, O Lord, our humanity with Thy divinity,

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

Thy greatness with our humility, and our humility with Thy greatness

31. Deacon : Priests, raise up your hands.

32. Priest : That we may offer unto Thee this (pointing) offering which Thou did grant unto Thy disciples.

33. People : We believe that this is He, truly we believe.

34. Priest : Saying, Take, eat, this (pointing) bread is My body which will be broken for you and given for the remission of sin and for eternal life. Amen. (+ three times).

35. People : Amen. Amen. Amen. We believe and confess, we glorify Thee, O our Lord and our God ; that this is He we truly believe.

36. Priest : Likewise Thou spoke to them over the cup saying, Take, drink, this (pointing) cup is My blood which will be shed for you and given for the remission of sin and for eternal life. Amen. (+ three times)

Then he shall move the cup with his right hand in the sign of the cross.

37. People : Amen. Amen. Amen.

38. Priest : And Thou said unto them, Whenever you eat of this bread and drink of this cup do this in remembrance of Me : (+ once over the Bread, once over the Cup, and once more over Both) proclaim My death believing in My resurrection.

39. People : Amen. Lord pity us, Lord spare us, Lord have mercy upon us.

40. Priest : And keep My remembrance.

41. People : We proclaim Thy death, Lord, and Thy holy resurrection;

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

we believe thy ascension and Thy second advent. We glorify thee and confess Thee, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, O our Lord and our God.

42. Deacon : With all the heart let us beseech the Lord our God that He grant unto us the good communion of the Holy Spirit.

43. People : As it was, is and shall be unto generations of generations, unto endless ages.

44. Priest : We offer it unto Thee in glory and praise, in thanksgiving and greatness, that it may be to all who take of it for rejoicing and happiness, for healing and help, for the renewal of the body and cure of the spirit and soul; and all of them together give thanks unto Thee with one voice, unto the ages of ages.

45. Priest : Grant us to be united through thy Holy Spirit, and heal us by this oblation that we may live in thee for ever.

The people shall repeat his words.

46. Priest : Blessed be the name of the Lord, and blessed be He that comes in the name of the Lord, and let the name of His glory be blessed. So be it. So be it. So be it blessed.

The people shall repeat his words.

47. Priest : Send the grace of the Holy Spirit upon us.

The people shall repeat his words.

* * *

48. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

49. Priest : Prayer of Fraction.

We give thanks unto Thee, O Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of powers, the Lord of authorities, and the Lord of mercies

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

50. Because Thou has made us worthy of this Thy holy and pure mystery that we may glorify and praise Thee Who dwells with the saints, and Whose glory is wonderful for ever, Lord almighty, Lord our God.

51. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father who art in heaven . .

(see Anaphora #2, #69 : p. 62)

52. Priest : O almighty God, we offer our prayer unto Thee and supplicate Thee, because Thou has made us worthy of this pure and holy mystery.

53. Through Thy divinity Thou dwells in this bread which we receive, so let it be to those who receive of it for rejoicing and gladness, for healing and help and everlasting life, for the renewal of the body and cure of the spirit and soul. Add them to Thine inheritance in Thy heavenly kingdom.

54. Through Thine only - begotten Son, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

55. People : According to Thy mercy, our God, and not according to our sins. (to be repeated thrice)

(Again) The hosts of the angels of the Saviour of the world stand before the Saviour of the world and encircle the Saviour of the world, even the body and the blood of the Saviour of the world.

Let us draw near the face of the Saviour of the world. In the faith which is of Him we believe in the birth of Christ.

56. Asst. Deacon : Open ye the gates, princes.

57. Deacon : Ye who are standing, bow

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

58. Priest : O Creator of great lights, it is Jesus Christ alone Who divided the light from darkness. Keep Thy people who have bowed their head unto Thee and who wait for blessing and good hope from Thee, so that Thou may keep and bless them and cause their children to grow ; and as often as they receive the holy communion, grant it to be to them for blessing, through Jesus Christ our Lord, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

59. Deacon : Worship the Lord with fear.

People : Before Thee, Lord, we worship, and Thee do we glorify.

60. Priest : Prayer of Penitence.
(Anaphora of the Apostles 72-88: pp. 47, 48)

61. Deacon : Give heed.

Priest : Holy things for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

62. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

63. At this time the priest shall lift up the whole Host with his hand and say:

Lord, have compassion upon us,
O Christ. (three times in a loud chant and fifteen times in a low chant)

The people shall repeat his words.

Then he shall repeat them three times and the people twice.

64. Deacon : Ye that are penitent, bow your heads.

65. Then he shall turn to the people and say:

Priest : Lord our God (Anaphora of the Apostles, # 95 - 103: pp. 49, 50, and again # 104 - 138: pp. 50 - 53.)

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

66. After receiving the Holy Communion.

Priest : Pilot of the Soul.

Again we supplicate the almighty Lord our God, Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Thou art eternal God and Thy name is great and holy.

67. Thou art glorified by the high ones, and the humble praise Thee. We thank and glorify Thee because Thou has made us worthy of this holy communion which we have received.

68. Fulfill it to us through Thy faith, to be for life and salvation, so that we may thank and glorify Thee at every time and at every hour, O almighty Lord our God.

69. Deacon : Pray ye.

70. Priest : O almighty God, we pray Thee and beseech Thee to sanctify us by the Holy Spirit. O Lord, make this to be to us for blessing that we may thank and glorify Thee at every time and at every hour.

71. Through Thine only-begotten Son, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages.

People: Amen.

72. Priest : The Laying on of the Hand.

Our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, bless us and sanctify us ; make us worthy to return to our homes joyfully without sin or blemish.

73. Let Thy body and Thy blood which we have received from Thine honourable table be for our life.

THE ANAPHORA OF ST. GREGORY II

74. O Lord, send Thy Holy Spirit unto us that He may guide us in purity and faith.

The Son of God prepared His body and blood in the world that we may receive them and live with Him.

75. He has brought us near to Him, towards His holy altar through His mercy that we may be called servants of God and the dwelling-place of the most high.

Let us all draw near Him before His face in supplication, worship, purity, and faith.

76. May His holy body and His precious blood which we have received at the hands of the priests who offer prayer, be to us for life, remission of sin, resurrection from the dead and the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven, unto the ages of ages. Amen.

THE END.

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

COMMON INTRODUCTION ¹

The priest shall face the east and chant in a loud voice « Holy ». And the people shall chant after him as indicated below:

Priest : Ho - ly :

People : G - o - d,

All : holy Mighty, holy

Living, Immortal, Who was born of the holy Virgin Mary ; have mercy upon us, Lord.

Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal, who was baptized in Jordan and crucified on the tree of the cross ; have mercy upon us, Lord.

Holy God, holy Mighty, holy Living, Immortal, Who did rise from the dead on the third day, ascend into heaven in glory, sit at the right hand of the Father and will come again in glory to judge the quick and the dead;
have mercy upon us, Lord.

Glory be to the Father, glory be to the Son, glory be to the Holy Spirit, both now and unto the ages of ages.
Amen. And Amen. So be it; so be it.

¹ The above prayer is the introduction for «The Prayer of the Covenant» which is said at three different times daily. In each instance, it concludes with a “Version” specific to the time, as follows:

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Version 1

MIDNIGHT PRAYER OF THE COVENANT.

Instruction: The priest shall turn his face towards the people and chant the following in a loud voice, and the people shall say according to the order.

Priest : Glory be to God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : O Lord, maker of all, invisible God, we stretch out our soul to Thee and we offer morning prayer unto Thee. O Lord, the powerful wisdom of all, God merciful maker of the soul, we glorify Thee, begotten from the Father beyond the creation of the world; Thou, Who art the only Word and rests in Thy saints, art praised by the archangels with ceaseless glories.

Thou was not made by hands but art creator of the hidden things, Thou art the invisible, pure, and holy, and the announcer Who told us the wisdom of Thy hidden glory. Thou made us to hope for the unquenchable light; and we, Thy servants, offer unto Thee glory, thanksgiving and holiness ; and the people glorify Thee.

People : O Lord, we glorify Thee.

Priest : O God of light, Thou art the source of life, the head of knowledge, the giver of grace from the perfect grace, the maker of the soul, giver of good, giver of the Holy Spirit, the treasure of wisdom, the helper, the teacher of saints, the foundation of the world, who accepts the prayer of the holy ones.

We glorify thee, O only-begotten Son, the first-born Word of the Father, Thou has granted Thy universal grace to us who call upon Thee.

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

O pure and blameless Father, with Thee are the treasures which moth and rust do not corrupt, and of which Thou gives to them who trust upon Thee in all their thoughts.

Thou made the angels desire to visit the light which was before the world, and Thou art our unchangeable guardian. Through Thy Father's pleasure Thou has enlightened us, we who had valued darkness, we whom Thou has brought from darkness into light, granted us life after death, and freedom from slavery. By Thy cross Thou has brought us nearer to Thy Father in heaven. By the Gospel Thou has led us, and by the prophets Thou has comforted us, we whom Thou has brought near, O God. O God, give us light. We praise Thee, O our God, that with ceaseless thanksgiving we may say that we are Thy servants; and the people praise Thee.

People : O Lord, we praise Thee.

Priest : O Jesus, the Son of God, Who is above all, we offer three fold thanksgiving unto Thee with Thy Father, in Thine eternal kingdom, and all the creatures glorify Thee in trembling and fear of soul.

People : Every soul fears Thee.

And all the souls of the righteous trust in Thee, Thou Who quieted the stormy floods of the evil spirits for our sake, and Who became for us life from destruction, and a refuge where there is the hope of eternal salvation. Thou saves those who are troubled on the sea, through Thy grace Thou heals those who are in the wilderness, Thou accompanies those whose imprisonment is very hard ; so free us from the bond of death.

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Thou comforts the miserable and the weeping, Thou saves the weak with Thy cross, it is Thou Who takes away and removes all the wrath from us who have trusted in Thee. O Lord, Whom the prophets and the apostles thanked secretly, we thank Thee. We glorify Thee, so that, believing in Thee and fulfilling Thy will, we may rest in the abode of life. Grant us to walk according to Thine order. O Lord, through Thy mercy visit all, small and great, rulers and people, shepherd and flock, for Thine is the kingdom, O blessed Lord our God. Glory be to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as before the creation of the cosmos, so both now and ever, and from generation to endless generations, and ages without end.

People : Amen. Go to "Then" in 2nd column of page 172

MORNING PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Instruction : The priest shall turn his face towards the faithful, chanting the following in a loud voice, and the faithful shall respond as indicated below:

Priest : The grace of God be with you.

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Let us glorify our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : Concentrate the thoughts of your heart.

People : We lift them unto the Lord, our Father Who art in heaven, our Father who art in heaven, our Father who art in heaven, lead us lest we hap into temptation.

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Priest : O God the Father, giver of light, the power of all, visitor of all souls, light which was before, creator of the world, the leader of life and giver of immortal happiness, Thou has taken us out of the snares of darkness, and granted us the inestimable light. Thou has loosed us, we who believe in Thee, and covered us with faith.

Thou art not far from Thy servants, but rather, Thou art always with them. Thou does not neglect the soul which begs Thee with fear and trembling. Thou knows all before the thought, and examines all before the thought. Through Thy will Thou supplies our needs before we ask; Thou hears us who call upon Thee without doubting. Thou art the inestimable light, and the King of the heavenly hosts, hearer of the glorious song of the archangels upon whom Thou rests.

O Lord, we pray Thee to hear us. Grant us the unceasing word in trust. We glorify Thee, we thank Thee, and we bless Thee; O Lord, we, Thy servants, glorify Thee because we depend upon Thee.

People : O Lord, we glorify Thee.

Priest : O Lord, Jesus Christ, holy, Thou has heard us. Thou became a word to the dumb, a staff to the broken ones, light to the blind, a way to the lame, and the purifier of the lepers. O Lord, Thou did heal the sick and cure the deaf. Thou rebuked death and destroyed the darkness. Thou created the light of the sun which does not set, the unquenchable light, the Sun which always shines over the holy ones, Thou established all through Thy fixed will for the decoration of the world.

Thou appeared clearly to all to save man, Thou art the restorer of the soul, and Thou was beforehand in determining all things rightly. O Thou, Creator of angels, Father of all, the adornment of the world and the maker of earth, Wisdom and Knowledge were sent to the world by the everlasting Father. This existence is unchangeable and immeasurable and invisible spirit. Thou art the glorious announcer and Thy name is wonderful. For this reason we, Thy servants, praise Thee, O Lord.

People : O Lord, we praise Thee.

Priest : We offer this three-fold holy glory unto Thee, Who has given us Thine unchangeable faith, enabling us to break the bonds of death. Thou created the upright minds of those who believe in Thee, that they may be called gods among men. Thou has granted us to tread down all the powers of the enemy through the Spirit, so that we may loosen that which could not be loosened. Thou has made effectual for us love towards Thy Father and made reconciliation between us and Him.

O Lord, hear those who beg Thee. O Lord, let not us, who petition Thee fall into sin, but vindicate us against our enemies, our accusers.

Grant us continuous prayer that we may be kept from being swallowed up by the enemy.

O eternal King, hear: comfort the widows, accept the orphans, purify the unclean through Thy mercy, grant wisdom to the foolish, restore the lost, save the prisoners, and be a refuge to all of us, for Thine is the blessed kingdom, O Lord our God.

People : Amen. Go to "Then" in 2nd column of page 172

VERSION 3

EVENING PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Instruction : The priest shall turn his face towards the people and chant the following in a loud voice, and the people shall respond as indicated :

Priest : The grace of God be with you

People : And with your spirit.

Priest : Give thanks unto our God.

People : It is right, it is just.

Priest : O immortal Father, Saviour of our soul, the foundation of wisdom, keeper of our hearts, Thou has granted light to our inward eyes and covered us with Thy knowledge against the darkness of our mind. By the cross of Thine Only-begotten, Thou did save the first man, who was given to destruction, and did renew him by the immortal things. Iniquities vanished at Thy command, and Thou made redemption through the death of Thy Son, even as He searched for the lost one. For this reason we, Thy servants, glorify Thee, O Lord.

People : We glorify Thee, O Lord.

Priest : We praise Thee, O Lord, with glorious song, Thou, Whom the archangels glorify, always, unceasingly and without rest. Whom also, the lords praise singing with the praise of glory and thanksgiving. O Lord, Thou has sent Thy counsel, Word, Wisdom, and Thy visitation, Who was with Thee before the cosmos began, without being created, that is the Word Who was not created, Thy beloved Son, Who appeared in flesh for mankind's salvation.

PRAYER OF THE COVENANT

Priest : From our heart we offer to Thee three fold praise, O Lord, giver of life. Thou visited the soul of the humble and despised not the troubled soul. Thou accepted the persecuted and helped them, Thou saved those in difficulty. Thou thought of the hungry and avenged the victims of sin. Thou art the friend of the faithful, speaker to the righteous, dwelling-place for the pure ; Thou hears those who call upon Thee in righteousness, protects the widow, saves the orphan, grants right leadership to the Church which Thou has made a dwelling-place of the glorious faith, the council of the Spirit, the giver of grace and power. While we praise Thee without rest, we confess in our hearts Thy kingdom which was declared unto us by Thee and Thy beloved Son, our Lord Jesus, through Whom be glory and dominion to Thee, unto the ages of ages.

People : Amen.

Then: The Lord's Prayer, Hail Mary, (see p. 173) Lord have mercy. . . 12x, For Mary's sake, have mercy on us 12x, finishing with the Prayer of Absolution by the priest.

Conclusion to every version, chanted together by all: O holy Trinity, living God, have mercy upon us.

If this Prayer of the Covenant is chanted as part of the qidase, with most Anaphora's return to page 34. Exceptions, as noted on p.33, are that of St. Mary: go to #90, on p.80; and St. John Chrysostom: go to #68 on p.140

FREQUENTLY USED PRAYERS

“Abune zebesemayat” / “Our Father”
/ “The Lord’s Prayer” (1)

Our Father Who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name.
Thy kingdom come,
Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.
Give us this day our daily bread.
And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.
Even lead us, lest we enter into temptation,
but deliver us from the evil one.
For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

HAIL MARY (2)

O our Lady, Mariam, in the greeting of the holy Angel Gabriel, “Peace be to you.” As Virgin, both in conscience as well as flesh, you are blessed among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb. O full of grace, pray to your beloved Son, that He may forgive us our sins.

The Prayer of Faith (1)

1. We believe in one God the Father almighty, maker of heaven, earth and all things visible and invisible.

2. And we believe in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of the Father Who was with Him before the creation of the world:

3. Light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, of one essence with the Father

4. By Whom all things were made, and without Him was not anything in heaven or earth made.

5. Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, was made man and was incarnate from the Holy Spirit and from the holy Virgin Mary.

6. Became man, was crucified for our sakes in the days of Pontius Pilate, suffered, died, was buried and rose from the dead on the third day as was written in the holy scriptures,

7. Ascended in glory into heaven, sat at the right hand of His Father, and will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead ; there is no end of His reign.

8. And we believe in the Holy Spirit
(2), the life-giving God, who proceeds from the Father; we worship and glorify Him with the Father and the Son ; Who spoke by the prophets,

9. and we believe in one holy, universal, apostolic church,

10. and we believe in one baptism for the remission of sins, and wait for the resurrection from the dead and the life to come, unto endless ages. Amen.

(1) (Mt. 6:9-14)

(2) (Lk. 1:28, 42)

(1) Used in all anaphoras other than that of the Apostles. The first part was adopted at Nicaea, 325

(2) This marks the end of the Nicæan Creed. The remainder was adopted by the Second Council at Constantinople in 381. See page 86 for more details

(72.) Priest : "Prayer of Penitence."

O Lord God, the Father almighty, Thou it is Who heals the wounds of our soul, body, and spirit,

(73.) because Thou has said, by the mouth of Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, that which He said to our father Peter, you are a rock, and upon this rock I will build My holy church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and unto you do I give the keys of the Kingdom of heaven; what you shall have bound on earth shall be bound in heaven, and what you shall have loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven

(74.) Let all Thy servants and Thy handmaids, according to their several names, be absolved and set free out of the mouth of the Holy Spirit, and out of the mouth of me also, Thy sinful and guilty servant. . . whether they have wrought wittingly or unwittingly.

(75.) Keep them, Lord, and defend them, thy servants, my fathers, brothers and sisters.

(76.) And also loose me, thy humble and sinful servant

(77.) Both absolve them and set them free: out of the mouth of the holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and out of the mouth of me Thy sinful and unrighteous servant.

(78.) O propitious, merciful, man loving Lord our God, Who takes away the sin of the world, accept the penitence of Thy servants and Thy handmaids, and shine upon them with the light of everlasting life, and forgive them, Lord, all their sins; for Thou art good and the lover of man.

(79) O Lord our God, merciful, slow to anger, plenteous in mercy and righteous, forgive me my sins

(80) and deliver all thy servants and handmaids from all transgression and curse. If we have transgressed against Thee, Lord, whether in our word, deed, or thought, release, remit, pardon and have mercy, for Thou art good and the lover of man, Lord our God.

(81) O Lord, absolve us and set us free, and absolve all Thy people, and absolve me Thy sinful servant.

PSALM 24 (use with II : 11, page 13)
(A Psalm by David)

(1) Unto Thee, O Lord, have I lifted up my soul.

(2) O my God, in Thee I trust; let me not be put to shame, nor let mine enemies laugh at me.

(3) For none who wait for Thee should be ultimately shamed; let those who aimlessly do wrong be ashamed.

(4) Thy ways, O Lord, make known to me, and teach me Thy paths.

(5) Guide me in Thy truth and teach me; for Thou, O God, art my Saviour, and on Thee do I wait all day.

(6) Remember Thy compassions and Thy mercies, O Lord, for they are from all eternity.

(7) Remember not the sins and ignorance of my youth; rather, for Thy goodness' sake, remember me in Thy mercy, O Lord.

8 Good and upright is the Lord;
He ordained law for those who sin on the way.

9 He will guide the meek in judgment,
He will teach the meek His ways.

10 All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth to those who seek His covenant and His laws.

11 For Thy Name's sake, O Lord, pardon my sin, for it is great.

12 Who is the man who fears the Lord?
He will guide him in the way he should choose.

13 His soul shall abide in fulfillment, and his children will inherit the earth.

14 The Lord is the strength of those who fear Him; and His covenant is to make them know it.

15 Mine eyes are continually on the Lord, for He will draw my feet out of the net.

16 Turn Thy face to me and have mercy on me, for I am only begotten and poor.

17 The sorrows of my heart are multiplied;
O bring me out of my troubles.

18 Behold mine abasement and my weariness, and forgive me all my sins.

19 See how mine enemies have increased, and the cruel hatred with which they hate me.

20 O keep my soul and deliver me;
let me not be ashamed, for I have hoped in Thee.

21 The guileless and upright have joined me, because I wait for Thee, O Lord.

22 Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his afflictions.

PSALM 60 (use with II : 11)
(For the End. With Hymns By David)

1 Hear my supplication, O God; attend to mine entreaty.

2 From the ends of the earth I cried to Thee when my heart is despondent, Thou wilt lift me high on a rock;

as Thou hast guided me.

3 For Thou art become my hope, a tower of strength against the face of the enemy.

4 I will dwell in Thy habitation unto the age.

I will find shelter in the shadow of Thy wings. (Pause)

5 For Thou, O God, hast heard my prayers;
Thou hast given an inheritance to those who fear Thy Name.

6 Thou wilt add days to the days of the King, and prolong his days unto generations and generations.

7 He will continue unto the ages in the presence of God.

Who will seek out His mercy and truth?

8 That is why I will chant to Thy Name unto the ages of ages, that I may perform my vows from day to day.

PSALM 101 (use with II : 11)

(A Prayer for a poor man when he is despondent and pours out his petitions before the Lord)

1 O Lord, hear my prayer, and let my cry come to Thee.

2 Turn not Thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble;
incline Thine ear to me.

Answer me speedily in the day when I call.

3 For my days vanish like smoke, and my bones burn like brushwood.

4 My heart is sick and dry as grass, so that I forget to eat my bread.

5 Because of my loud groaning my bones stick to my flesh

6 I have become like a pelican of the desert;

I am like a screech-owl in a ruined building.

7 I keep vigil, and am become like a solitary bird on the housetop.

8 All day long mine enemies taunt me, and those who praise me swear against me.

9 For I have eaten ashes like bread and mingled my drink with weeping, 10 because of the appearance of Thy wrath and Thy fury;
 for Thou hast lifted me up and cast me down.
 11 My days decline like a shadow, and I am withered like grass.
 12 But Thou, O Lord, dost endure for ever and Thy remembrance throughout all generations.
 13 Thou wilt rise and have mercy on Zion;
 for it is time to have mercy on her,
 because the time has come.
 14 For Thy servants delight in her stones and have pity on her dust.
 15 The nations will fear Thy Name, O Lord, and all the kings of the earth Thy glory.
 16 For the Lord will build up Zion and will appear in His glory.
 17 He will regard the prayer of the humble, and will not ignore their need.
 18 Let this be written for another generation, so a people to be created may praise the Lord.
 19 He stooped from His holy height; the Lord looked from heaven at the earth 20 to hear the groaning of the prisoners and release the children of those put to death, 21 to declare the Name of the Lord in Zion and His praise in Jerusalem, 22 to gather together the peoples and their kings to serve the Lord.
 23 The very strength in the way itself determines how few are the days of my mission.
 24 Do not take me away in the midst of my days.
 Thy years are throughout all generations.
 25 In the beginning, O Lord, Thou didst found the earth,
 and the heavens are the work of Thy hands.
 26 They will perish, but Thou remains;
 they will all wear out like a garment, and Thou wilt change them like clothing and they will be changed.
 27 But Thou art ever the same,
 and Thy years never end.
 28 The children of Thy servants will dwell securely,
 and their descendants will be guided for ever.

PSALM 102 (use with II : 11)
 (By David)

1 Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy Name.
 2 Bless the Lord, O my soul,
 and overlook not all His due praises:
 3 Who overlooks all your iniquities,
 Who heals all your infirmities,
 4 Who redeems your life from perdition,
 Who crowns you with mercy and compassion,
 5 Who satisfies your desire with fulfillment;
 your youth as that of an eagle shall be renewed.
 6 The Lord offers acts of mercy and judgment to all who are wronged.
 7 He made known His ways to Moses,
 To the sons of Israel His own will.
 8 The Lord is compassionate and merciful, long-suffering and of rich mercy.
 9 He will not till the end cherish anger, nor unto the ages will He threaten.
 10 He has not dealt with us according to our sins,
 nor repaid us according to our iniquities.
 11 For as from the height of heaven above the earth, has the Lord directed mercy to those who fear
 Him.
 12 As far as the East is from the West,
 so far has He separated our iniquities from us.
 13 As a father has compassion on his children, thus the Lord has compassion on those who fear Him.
 14 For He knows our substance,
 He remembers that we are dust.
 15 The days of man are as the grass;
 as a flower of the field he shall blossom.
 16 Once the spirit in him has passed, he will not exist;
 even his place no longer will be recognized.
 17 But the mercy of the Lord is from eternity, and remains unto eternity for those who fear Him.
 18 Also His righteousness is upon sons of sons, for those who value His covenant, both remember His commandments and do them.
 19 The Lord has prepared His throne in heaven, and His kingdom embraces all.
 20 Bless the Lord, all His angels, mighty in strength , who do His word and listen to the voice of His commands.

21 Bless the Lord, all His Hosts,
His ministers who do His will.

22 Bless the Lord, all His works, in every place of His dominion.
Bless the Lord, O my soul.

PSALM 129 (use with II : 11)

(An Ode of Ascent)

1 Out of the depths I cried to Thee, O Lord.

2 O Lord, hear my voice;

let Thine ears be attentive to the voice of my prayer.

3 If Thou, O Lord, should study our sins,
O Lord, who would be left standing:

4 But with Thee is forgiveness.

5 For Thy Name's sake I wait for Thee, O
Lord;

my soul waits for Thy word.

6 My soul hopes for the Lord from the morning watch till the night; from the morning watch
let Israel hope for the Lord.

7 for with the Lord there is mercy, and with Him there is full redemption.

8 And He will redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

PSALM 130 use with II : 11

(An Ode of Ascent)

1 O Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor my gaze focused loftily;
I have not dealt with great things,
Nor with marvels beyond me.

2 If I am not humbled,
but exalt myself,
like a weaned child against its mother,
Thou will censure my soul.

3 Let Israel trust in the Lord, henceforth and unto the age.

ANAPHORA OF THE APOSTLES

Segment used in other anaphoras: see p. 179

6. Deacon : For the sake of the blessed and holy Patriarch Abba (_____) and the blessed Archbishop Abba (_____) while they yet give Thee thanks in their prayer and their supplications : Stephen the first martyr, Zacharias the priest and John the Baptist.

7. And for the sake of all the saints and martyrs who have gone to their rest in faith Matthew and Mark, Luke, and John, the four Evangelists; Mary the mother of God, Simon Peter and Andrew, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, Thaddaeus and Nathanael, James the son of Alphaeus and Matthias, the twelve Apostles; and James the Apostle, brother of the Lord, Bishop of Jerusalem : Paul, Timothy, Silas, and Barnabas; Titus, Philemon, and Clement, the seventy-two disciples, the five hundred brethren, the three hundred and eighteen Orthodox; may the prayers of them all come unto us and visit us together with them.

8. And remember Thou the peace of the universal apostolic church which was made by Christ through His precious blood.

9. Remember, Thou, all the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons who keep straight the way of the true word.

10. Asst. Priest : shall say
“The Prayer of Benediction” of St. Basil
O holy Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, bless Thy people, beloved Christians, with heavenly and earthly blessings.

11. And send upon us the grace of the Holy Spirit, and keep the doors of Thy holy church open unto us in mercy and in faith; and perfect unto us the faith of Thy holy Trinity unto our last breath.

12. O my Lord Jesus Christ, visit the sick of Thy people; heal them; and guide our fathers and our brethren who have journeyed, becoming strangers : bring them back to their dwelling places in peace and in health.

13. Bless the airs of heaven (+ toward heaven), and the rains and the fruits of the earth of this year, in accordance with Thy grace, and make joy and gladness prevail perpetually on the face of the earth (+ toward the earth).

14. And confirm for us Thy peace. Turn the hearts of mighty kings to deal kindly with us always.

15. Grant peace to the scholars of the church, who are continually gathered in Thy holy church; to all, to each by their several names, in the presence of powerful kings, O our God, increase Thy peace.

16. Rest the souls of our ancestors, both our brothers and sisters who have fallen asleep and gained their rest in the right faith.

17. And bless those who give gifts of incense (+ over the people), bread and wine, ointment and oil, hangings and reading books, and vessels for the sanctuary, that Christ our God may give them their reward in the heavenly Jerusalem.

18. And all of them that are assembled with us to entreat for mercy, Christ our God have mercy upon them: and all them that give alms before Thine awful and terrifying throne, receive.

19. And comfort every straitened soul, them who are in chains and them who are in exile or captivity.

20. And them that are held in bitter servitude, our God, deliver them in Thy mercy. And all of them that have entrusted it to us to remember them in our supplications to Thee, O our Master Jesus Christ, remember them in Thy heavenly kingdom, and remember me, thy sinful servant.

21. O Lord save Thy people and bless Thine inheritance (+ over the people), feed them and lift them up for ever.

Anaphora of the Apostles p.45

34. People : Remember us all in Thy kingdom ; remember us, Lord, Master, in Thy kingdom ; remember us, Lord, in Thy kingdom, as Thou remembered the thief on the right hand when Thou was on the tree of the holy cross.

Anaphora of the Lord, p. 62

69. Deacon : Pray ye.

People : Our Father Who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, give us this day our daily bread ; forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors, and lead O Lord, lest we hap into temptation, but deliver us rescuing us from all evil ; for Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory for ever and ever.

Anaphora of the Apostles, p. 47

72. Priest : ((Prayer of Penitence)).

O Lord God, the Father almighty, it is Thou that heals the wounds of our soul and our body and our spirit,

73. because Thou has said, with the mouth of Thine only-begotten Son, our Lord and our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, that which He said to our father Peter, you are a rock, and upon this rock I will build My holy church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and unto you I give the keys of the Kingdom of heaven ; what you shall have bound on earth shall be bound in heaven, and what you shall have loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven

74. Let all thy servants and thy handmaids, according to their several names, be absolved and set free out of the mouth of the Holy Spirit, and out of the mouth of me also, Thy sinful and guilty servant. . . whether they have wrought wittingly or unwittingly.

75. Keep them, Lord, and defend them, thy servants, my fathers, brothers and sisters.

76. And also loose me, thy humble and sinful servant

77. And absolve them and set them free out of the mouth of the holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and out of the mouth of me thy sinful and unrighteous servant.

78. O propitious, merciful and lover of man, Lord our God, that takes away the sin of the world, accept the penitence of Thy servants and Thy handmaids, and shine upon them with the light of everlasting life, and forgive them, Lord, all their sins ; for Thou art good and the lover of man.

79. O Lord our God, merciful, slow to anger, plenteous in mercy and righteous, forgive me my sins

80. and deliver all thy servants and handmaids from all transgression and curse. If we have transgressed against Thee, Lord, whether in our word, or in our deed, or in our thought, release, remit, pardon and have mercy, for Thou art good and the lover of man, Lord our God.

81. O Lord, absolve us and set us free, and absolve all Thy people, and absolve me Thy sinful servant.

82. Then he shall turn his face towards the people, bless them three times, make mention of them that are with him and say also:

Remember, Lord, the honourable father, our Patriarch Abba _____ and the blessed Archbishop Abba _____.

Our God, keep them for us for many years and length of days in righteousness and peace.

REPEATED PARAGRAPHS, p. 3

83. Remember, Lord, our ruler (emperor, king, queen, president, governor) and loose (him, her, them) from all the chains of sin which (___) has committed wittingly or unwittingly, subdue (___) adversaries and (___) enemies under (___) feet speedily.

84. Remember, Lord, the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, priests and deacons, anagnosts and singers, virgins and monks, widows and orphans, men and women, aged and children; and all Christian people that are standing in this holy church; strengthen them in the faith of Christ.

85. Priest shall mention those that have lately passed away.

Remember, Lord, all our fathers, brothers and sisters that are asleep and resting in the orthodox faith, and lay their souls in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

86. And as for us, deliver us from every transgression and curse, and from all wickedness and from all rebellion and from all false swearing and from all anathemas and from all perjury and from mingling with heretics and gentiles in error and defilement.

87. Grant us, Lord, wisdom, power, reason, understanding and knowledge, that we may depart and flee for evermore from all works of Satan the tempter.

88. Grant us, Lord, to do Thy will and Thy good pleasure at all times, and write our names in the book of life in the kingdom of heaven with all saints and martyrs, through Jesus Christ our Lord, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto ages of ages. Amen.

89. Deacon : Give heed.

90. Priest : Holy things are for the holy.

People : One is the holy Father, one is the holy Son, one is the Holy Spirit.

91. Priest : The Lord be with all of you.
People : And with your spirit.

92. The priest shall then lift up the whole Host with his hands and say:

Lord, have compassion upon us.

O Christ ; Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ, Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ. (three times in a loud chant, and fifteen times in a low chant). Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ.

The people shall repeat his words.

93. Then the priest shall say three times:
Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ.

The people shall say twice : Lord, have compassion upon us, O Christ.

94. Deacon : Ye that are penitent bow your heads.

95. Priest : turning toward the people:

Lord our God, look upon Thy people that are penitent, and according to Thy great mercy, have mercy upon them, and according to the multitude of Thy compassion blot out their iniquity, cover them and keep them from all evil.

96. And redeem their souls in peace, forgive their former works, join them with Thy holy church, through the grace and compassion of Thine only-begotten Son our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

97. Deacon : Arise for prayer.

People : Lord have mercy upon us.

Priest : Peace be unto all of you.

People : And with your spirit.

98. Priest : This (pointing) is the true holy body of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, that is given for life, salvation, remission of sin unto them that receive of it in faith.

People : Amen.

99. Priest : This (pointing) is the true precious blood of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, which is given for life, salvation, and remission of sins into those who drink of it in faith.

People : Amen.

100. Priest : For this (pointing) is the body and blood of Emmanuel our very God.

People : Amen.

101. Priest : I believe, I believe, I believe and I confess, unto my last breath, that this (pointing) is the body and blood of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, which He took from the Lady of us all, the holy Mary of twofold virginity, and made it one with His godhead without mixture or confusion, without division or alteration; and He verily confessed with a good testimony in the days of Pontius Pilate, and this body He gave up for our sakes and for the life of us all.

People : Amen.

102. Priest : I believe, I believe. I believe and I confess that His godhead was not separated from His manhood, not for an hour nor for the twinkling of an eye, but He gave it up for our sakes for life, salvation, and remission of sin unto them that partake of it in faith.

People : Amen.

103. Priest : I believe, I believe, I believe and I confess that this (pointing) is the body and blood of our Lord, God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that to Him are rightly due honour and glory and adoration with His kind heavenly Father and the Holy Spirit, the life-giver, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

104. Then the priest shall take in his hand the “asbadikon” which bears the sign of the cross, dip it into the chalice, into the blood, and with it make the sign of the cross on the Body : First on the large outer parts, second on the inner parts, and third on the small parts. Then, with the Body, he shall make the sign of the cross over the Blood and say:

Blessed be God, almighty Father, our God.

And blessed be the only-begotten Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

And blessed be the Holy Spirit the Paraclete, the comforter and cleanser of us all.

Then the assistant deacon shall offer water to the priests and deacons to wash their hand, signifying that they should be holy in their souls.

105. Meanwhile, the priest celebrant shall say this prayer :

Lord my God, behold the sacrifice of Thy Son's body, which pleases Thee. Through it blot out all my sins because Thine only-begotten Son died for me.

106. And behold the pure blood of Thy Messiah, which was shed for me upon Calvary, cries aloud in my stead. Grant that the testimony of this blood may be unto the forgiveness of me Thy servant.

107. And accept my prayers for its sake, because thy beloved accepted the spear and the nails for my sake, and suffered to please Thee. But after I was saved, Satan returned to my heart and pierced me through with his darts. Grant me, Lord, Thy mercy, because he is a powerful accuser.

108. And by the provision of sin he slew me. Avenge me of the audacious one who is not satisfied with my being led astray from my life.

109. Thou, Lord, my King, God, Saviour bind up the wounds of soul and body of me Thy servant.

110. Before receiving the Holy Communion, all communicants shall say:

O my Lord Jesus Christ, it in no wise befits Thee to enter under the roof of my polluted house, for I have provoked Thee to wrath, for I have done evil in Thy sight, and through the transgression of Thy commandment have polluted my soul and body which Thou created after Thine image and likeness, and in me dwells no good thing.

111. But for the sake of Thy plan and Thine incarnation for my salvation, for the sake of Thy precious cross and Thy life-giving death, for the sake of Thy resurrection on the third day, I pray and beseech Thee, O my Lord, that Thou would purge me from all guilt and curse, and from all sin and defilement.

112. And when I have received Thy holy mystery, let it not be unto me for judgement nor for condemnation, but have compassion upon me and have mercy upon me; and through it grant me remission of my sin and life for my soul, O life of the world, through the petitions of our Lady, the holy Mary of twofold virginity, Thy mother, and of John the Baptist, and through the prayers of all the holy angels, and all the martyrs and righteous who have fought for the good unto the age without end. Amen.

113. While receiving the Holy Communion, the priest shall say quietly :

O my Lord, Jesus Christ, let not this Thy mystery be as an iniquity unto me; rather, let it be for the purifying of my soul and body.

114. Then he shall first receive the Host, afterward, he shall give it to the assistant priest who gives him the Blood. The prime celebrant shall give the other priests of the Body; his assistant shall give them of the Blood.

115. While offering the Body, the priest shall say the following at the Anaphora of the Lord:

The body of our Lord Jesus Christ for the sanctification of body, soul, and spirit. through the petitions of our Lady, the holy Mary of twofold virginity, Thy mother, and of John the Baptist, and through the prayers of all the holy angels, and all the martyrs and righteous who have fought for the good unto the age without end. Amen.

116. First of all the patriarch shall receive; then the archbishop; then the bishops. After them the priests and deacons. After that, everyone according to his degree. (1) Then the men, then the women. But the babies (and any others recently baptized) shall receive before the other faithful.

117. As one receives the Host, he shall say the following, while the Host is still in his mouth :

Holy, holy, holy, Trinity ineffable, grant me to receive this Body and Blood for life and not for condemnation. Grant me to bring forth fruit that will be well-pleasing unto Thee, to the end that I may appear in Thy glory, and live for Thee, doing Thy will.

118. In faith I call upon Thee, Father, and call upon Thy Kingdom. Hallowed, Lord, be Thy Name upon us, for mighty art Thou, praised and glorious, and to Thee be glory, unto endless ages.

119. Then he shall consume what he has received. While chewing he shall put his hand on his mouth. He shall chew in fear and trembling without making any sound till he finishes. Then he shall say:

Fill my mouth with praise, my heart with joy and my soul with gladness, fill me who have received of this divine mystery, O Thou who became man for the salvation of man.

120. As the assistant offers each the blood he shall say:

This is the cup of life that came down from heaven ; this is the precious Blood of Christ.

Then he who receives shall say : Amen. And Amen.

121. The Prayer of Basil. When the blood is in his mouth he shall say in his heart :

O my Lord and my God Jesus Christ, behold I have received Thy holy Body and Thy precious Blood. May they be for the remission of my sins and the blotting out of my trespasses.

122. O only-begotten Son and lover of man, fill my mouth with Thy praise that I may praise Thy glory, for Thou art He Who once became man and declared Himself through His incarnation in order to save me for ever. Thou has redeemed me for ever for the sake of Thy holy Name.

123. Glory be to Thee, O my Lord and my God Jesus Christ, Who has granted me (Thy Body and Thy Blood) at the hand of Thy servant.... I glorify thee and pray thee that I may be in the midst of Thy flock, and that accepting me, Thou will number me with Thy sheep.

124. And now remember not my trespasses. I give thanks for Thy grace which has been granted unto me, and for Thy help which has been with me.

125. Deacon : As he receives the cup:

I will take the cup of life, and call upon the name of the Lord.

Then he shall say : Pray ye for us and for all Christians who ask us to mention them. Praise ye and sing in the peace and love of Jesus Christ.

126. (See page 177) And then the clergy shall chant Ps. 150. They shall chant one by one or two by two according to their number, without ceasing.

127. The priest shall say as he goes out :

Those whom Thou has called, Lord. and hallowed, make happy with Thy call, confirm with Thy power, keep with Thy love, join in Thine everlasting kingdom through Christ, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

128. When the priest goes out he shall bless over the Paten once. Then he shall offer the Body to the people, and the deacon shall offer the Blood. As he offers to each, he says as at paragraph #115. And the people shall respond : "Amen" -once after the Body and twice after the Blood.

129. And after the people have received

Priest : O eternal God, light of life, Thou has given, Lord, unto us Thy servants strength and protection, during the present days and nights keeping all in peace. Bless them on this present day, and on those to come hereafter, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through Whom to Thee with Him and with the Holy Spirit be glory and dominion, both now and ever and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

Series Editor's Foreword

The Carolina Academic Press African World Series, inaugurated in 2010, offers significant new works in the field of African and Black World studies. The series provides scholarly and educational texts that can serve both as reference works and as readers in college classes.

Studies in the series are anchored in the existing humanistic and the social scientific traditions. Their goal, however, is the identification and elaboration of the strategic place of Africa and its Diaspora in a shifting global world. More specifically, the studies will address gaps and larger needs in the developing scholarship on Africa and the Black World.

The series intends to fill gaps in areas such as African politics, history, law, religion, culture, sociology, literature, philosophy, visual arts, art history, geography, language, health, and social welfare. Given the complex nature of Africa and its Diaspora, and the constantly shifting perspectives prompted by globalization, the series also meets a vital need for scholarship connecting knowledge with events and practices. Reflecting the fact that life in Africa continues to change, especially in the political arena, the series explores issues emanating from racial and ethnic identities, particularly those connected with the ongoing mobilization of ethnic minorities for inclusion and representation.

Acknowledgments

I am most grateful to Africa's most prominent historian and cultural icon, Professor Toyin Falola, for reasons far too numerous to mention. Like Òpílíkí in Ìrosùn Mèjì who thinks less of his own pursuit and serves others selflessly, Professor Falola worked tirelessly to ensure the publication of this book. I thank him immensely for his interest in me and his generosity, which includes providing me with good books on every visit to Nigeria. You shall remain stronger than cudgels torn from the armpits of the baobab!

I express my profound gratitude to Professor Adedotun Ogundeji of the Department of Linguistics and African Languages, University of Ibadan, whose vision and keen insights so dramatically helped this book. I thank him for his useful suggestions and for staying with me throughout the process of preparing the manuscript. I appreciate his humility and thank him for going to the field to provide some useful photographs for this project. Above all, I thank him for giving me the opportunity to have a university education.

In my department, I thank Professor Adebola Babatunde Ekanola, a forthright teacher, who was involved with signing of certain papers at the beginning of this project. Anything you touch becomes gold! I thank Dr. Francis Offor and Dr Isaac Ukpokolo for their brave encouragement all the time. I enjoy the unstinting support of Dr. Bolatito Lanre-Abass, Mrs. Abosede Ipadeola, Dr. Adeshina Afolayan, Dr. Chris Agulanna, Dr. Amaechi Udefi and Professor Olatunji Oyeshile. I appreciate the interest which Ademola Lawal and Adetola Layode took in the progress of this work. I am indebted to Professor Dipo Irele who first gave me the opportunity to work on Ifá and for sharing with me his own insights into other aspects of Yorùbá oral tradition. My thanks also go to the non-academic staff of the Department of Philosophy, University of Ibadan.

Outside my department, I thank Professor Ademola Dasylva and Professor Ayo Kehinde of the Department of English for their encouragement. I appreciate the wonderful support of Professor Solomon Oyetade and Professor Arinpe Adejumo of the Department of Linguistics and African Languages, Dr. J.K. Ayantayo of the Department of Religious Studies and Dr. C.O. Jegede of the Institute of African Studies. I thank Dr. A.S. Ajala and Dr. Chinyere Ukpokolo of the Department of Archaeology and Anthropology whose tough questions and lively discussion on Ifá system helped in shaping this work. I thank Dr. Kazeem Omofoyewa of the Department of Arabic and Islamic Studies, Dr. Tunde Awosanmi of the Department of Theatre Arts, Dr. Nike Akinjobi and Dr. Adeshina Sunday of the Department of English, for their friendship. I must express my profound gratitude to Dr. Bamidele Iromidayo Olu-Owolabi of the Department of Chemistry for her genuine concern, generous hospitality, kindness and support. I am indebted to the entire staff of the Institute of African Studies, University of Ibadan, especially Mrs. E.M. Emoekpeire who gave me access to a number of invaluable materials for this research.

Words cannot express my gratitude to Shennette Garrett-Scott of the Department of History, Case Western Reserve University, Ohio, who read the first draft of this book with a keen editorial eye and provided helpful comments. I must thank Tim Colton of Carolina Academic Press, Durham, for his patience and useful suggestions at the final stage of this project. My warmest regards go to Gbadega Adedapo, Managing Director of Rasmed Publications, Nigeria, for his genuine concern and encouragement towards the completion of this book. I thank my typist, Yemi Balogun, for her tireless work on the first draft. I owe a special debt to members of the Association of Nigeria Theatre Practitioners, Ogun State Chapter, especially Gbenga Adebayo, for their support. I am happy to thank those who shared with me the thoughts of publishing this book: Adekunle Adeyemi of the Department of Accountancy, Banking and Finance, Olabisi Onabanjo University, Ago-Iwoye, Bature Tukur Magazi, Kwabena Asumang, Joan Sansavoir, Keighley Bass, Kunle Fajuyigbe, Emile Shirley, Ayobami Adeleye, Mufutau Alade Adewale, Olakiitan Omotosho and Oyeronke Sanusi for her love and concern.

I thank Chief Olalere Akano and Chief Osuolale Ifabunmi who corroborated the myths of origin of Ifá with rare flair and lucidity. My profound gratitude goes to Mr. Olusegun Ogundele and Chief Olanipekun Fakayode for their tireless assistance during this research. I am particularly indebted to these Ifá priests for setting me straight on the esoteric subject of Yorùbá mythological figures and letting me into the rich repertoire of Ifá verses that enrich the main thrust of this project.

I thank my brother, Nurudeen Adekunle Raji of the Department of Mechanical Engineering, Lagos State University, Ojo, who has always given me his full support. Finally, this research would not have been completed without the constant support and tolerance of my wife, Tawa, and the children, especially my daughter, Adetutu, who always kept my company to the field for information and photographs. They have endured my journey through stress, euphoria and aggravation. I am grateful to them.

I must say that the list here does not suggest that those individuals whose names are mentioned are the only ones who have contributed in one way or the other to the realisation of this book.

Introduction

The purpose of this work is to show that Ifá, an oral text of the Yorùbá, is philosophical. I will establish this by examining its philosophical significance in the Yorùbá thought system. However, since different scholars on Yorùbá studies have used the term “Yorùbá” in different ways, it is illuminating that we first and foremost state what we mean by the term in this study.

In his well-read book, Yorùbá Culture: A Geographical Analysis, Afolabi Ojo uses the term “Yorùbá Proper” to designate only the Oyos.¹ By implication, Ojo’s assertion conveys the erroneous idea that “the Ifes, Owus, Egbas, Ijebus, Ondos, Ekitis . . . are mere sub-tribes.”² Acknowledging “the cultural impact of religious headquarters,”³ Remi Obateru challenges the exclusion by Ojo of the Ife community, in particular, from his conception of “Yorùbá Proper.” He shows the error in Ojo’s thesis of “Yorùbá Proper” by pointing out that:

All Yorùbá communities . . . regard Ife as their mother city—a city from where they fanned out in all directions to their present territories, taking ‘Ife Culture’ with them. Yorùbá history and archaeological investigation confirm this. If Ife is the point of dispersion, it is difficult to justify the description of a migrant sub-group (the Oyos) as the only Yorùbá Proper.⁴

Obateru further explains that the designation of “Yorùbá Proper” to only the Oyos arose from the politico-military preeminence that the Oyo kingdom once enjoyed, which no doubt “profoundly enhanced the status of Oyo Kingdom and the Alafin (King of Oyo) at the expense of the other Yorùbá kingdoms and their Obas (Kings).”⁵ Thus, Obateru believes that Ojo’s thesis of “Yorùbá Proper” should also seriously consider the indispensability of those communities he calls “sub-tribes” within a more accurate conception of “Yorùbá Proper.” The Oyos often claim the semantic connotations of the term “Yorùbá” originated from their region and, as such, have used this as a basis to regard themselves as “Yorùbá proper.”⁶ However, some scholars have described efforts to monopolize the term as “an arrogant behaviour without any historical justification,”⁷ and that the term “Yorùbá” “belongs to all the Yorùbá-speaking tribes with their different dialects.”⁸ It bears noting, therefore, that our use of the term “Yorùbá” in this study is coterminous with J. A. Atanda’s view that:

The bulk of the Yorùbá people are found in the south-western part of modern Nigeria, where they form one of the leading ethnic groups. Specifically, they effectively occupy the whole of Ogun, Ondo, Oyo and Lagos States and substantial part of Kwara State in the country. A substantial number of the Yorùbá people also inhabit the south-western part of the Republic of Benin (i.e. former Dahomey) which is contiguous with the area the people occupy in Nigeria. All these areas enumerated in Nigeria and in the Benin Republic formed what was known as the Yorùbá country before the European partition of Africa and the accompanying European rule. This Yorùbá country lies roughly between latitudes 6° and 9° North and longitudes 2°30' and 6°30' East. Its area is about 181,300 square kilometers. Beyond this area, pockets of Yorùbá population are found in other parts of Nigeria and in some other West African countries. Similar pockets of their population, largely off-shoots from their West African base, are also found across the Atlantic, as far afield as the Caribbean and South America, particularly in Cuba and in Brazil.⁹

The need to examine the philosophical significance of Ifá in the Yorùbá thought system is motivated by a number of reasons. One of these reasons is highlighted by Barry Hallen who believes that, for a long time, academic philosophers have overtly expressed their indignation against “the suggestion that an anonymous corpus of writings that included myths, legends, poetry, song, and proverbs was truly worthy of the title ‘philosophy.’”¹⁰ Another reason that informed this study is that Ifá occupies an important position in Yorùbá oral tradition, in part because “the general sanctions behind Yorùbá religion operate to maintain faith in the Ifá system.”¹¹ The tone of these two reasons, one might suspect, is perhaps the basis for the suggestion by some scholars (philosophers included) that Ifá is nothing more than a religious and mythic discourse that is not worthy of the title “philosophy.” More importantly, this study is motivated by existing studies on Ifá which show a dearth of a comprehensive analysis of the philosophical relevance of the Ifá literary corpus.

Most renowned scholars of Ifá, such as E.M. Lijadu, William Bascom, J. D. Clarke, Raymond Prince, and Wande Abimbola, have no doubt done an impressive job documenting and characterizing Ifá oral literature.¹² However, their studies have presented ethnological discussions and structural analysis of Ifá that convey the impression that Ifá is a characteristic social institution with only religious, ethnographical, and sociological significance. In other words, their studies are silent on the philosophical import of the Ifá corpus. The failure of these scholars to explore the philosophical dimensions of Ifá can be imputed to their “professional” interpretation of Ifá from the point of view of social anthropology. Thus, one is not surprised to find out that William Bascom’s most voluminous work on Ifá is nothing other than “an emphasis . . . on the Yorùbá . . . on the method of divination, the manner in which it ‘works’ and the Ifá verses that are of such fundamental importance to the entire system of divination.”¹³ It should be added that Bascom’s finest papers on Ifá are, like the work of J.D. Clarke, a distillation of his most voluminous works. They all are a reflection of the socio-anthropological interpretation of Ifá.¹⁴

E. M. Lijadu, one of the earliest Christian catechists, is also one of the most cited individuals who have published on Ifá. Inspired by the canon of his faith, Lijadu sees Ifá as a religion whose mode of worship should be of great interest to Christians and be compared with the Christian religion with a view to winning converts into the Christian faith.¹⁵ Raymond Prince, also one of the earliest scholars of Ifá, regards Ifá as a religious text, though his emphasis is on “the management of psychiatric disorder by Yorùbá traditional healers.”¹⁶ Bolaji Idowu, a notable scholar in the field of religious studies, also discusses Ifá from the standpoint of Yorùbá religion.¹⁷ His work is a demonstration of the monotheistic nature of the Yorùbá religion, despite the fact that this conception is attenuated by the several gods or deities that the Yorùbá worship. In clear terms, Idowu’s work, like the studies carried out by Lijadu and Prince, is uncritical and only accentuates “the widespread, but mistaken belief that Africans are religious in all things.”¹⁸

For his part, Wande Abimbola, conveniently the foremost African scholar of Ifá, acknowledges that Ifá is a repository of Yorùbá philosophy, but there is no evidence of the critical spirit of philosophy in any of his published studies.¹⁹ This means that his studies on Ifá lack, among others, what Olusegun Oladipo calls “conceptual sophistication” which could have given his studies some philosophical texture.²⁰ It must be stressed, however, that Abimbola seems to recognize the ages-long affiliation of wisdom to the enterprise of philosophy.²¹

I admit here that a number of scholars in the field of philosophy have, bringing with them a vocabulary and theoretical apparatus of the enterprise, attempted to show that Ifá should be regarded as a philosophical text. For instance, Sophie Oluwole, to demonstrate that some African literary pieces qualify as specimens of “strict” philosophy, delves into two Ifá verses, namely, Ọyèkú Mèjì and Ọwónrín Mèjì.²² She argues that the possibility of extracting a “thesis” and an “argument” from each of these verses points to the fact that Ifá is philosophical in the real sense of the word. Her work is also commendable because she seems to have succeeded in discerning between mere ethnological and structural analysis and what passes muster as critical analysis of the Ifá literary corpus.²³ However, when one considers several volumes of remonstrative reportage on the non-philosophical nature of such mythic and religious discourses as Ifá, Oluwolé's reliance on two verses (of the 256 Odùs, with their numerous verses that the system permits) to prove her point offers a fragmentary and tentative treatment of Ifá. Her work seems to allege an uncritical appraisal of Yorùbá thought system. Thus, to account for a clear-cut improvement upon Oluwolé's work, I delve into virtually all the sixteen principal odù of Ifá and a considerable number of sub-odus to establish the philosophical significance of Ifá.

Another work that underscores the justification for this study is Olufemi Taiwo's article "Ifá: An Account of a Divination System and Some Concluding Epistemological Questions."²⁴ On the surface, one might be lured to commend the article as a decisive reflection on the epistemological questions in Ifá system. A closer look at Taiwo's work will reveal, however, that he has not been able to analyse the epistemological perspective of Ifá beyond what Bascom, from the point of view of social anthropology, did in "The Sanctions of Ifá Divination" over six decades ago.²⁵ Even if Taiwo's work is regarded as a work in epistemology that provides "some way of grasping the philosophy of Ifá and the philosophical puzzles that it elicits," we can argue that it is inexhaustive.²⁶ Of course, epistemological questions in Ifá are not restricted to only the process of divination as Taiwo's work seems to suggest.

This work is divided into nine chapters. In Chapter One, I look at the meaning and essence of philosophy with a view to showing the historical development of the enterprise and how the term "philosophy" has undergone several mutations in its historical periods. In this chapter, I show that even the pre-Ionian poets, Homer and Hesiod, had an imperceptible understanding of philosophy and also mention that Plato and Aristotle use the primitive definition of "sophia" as either cleverness or skill in handicraft or art or as general knowledge of or expert acquaintance with a thing. The attempt in this chapter is mainly to show how the term philosophy was conceived during its inauguration in the intellectual tradition of the ancient era and how it has progressively gone through a lot of mutations in its historical periods.

In Chapter Two, I examine Eurocentrism and its conceptual extremes of philosophy and argue that philosophy is the prerogative of every individual, every culture.²⁷ I question the logic of "the conventional insinuation that Africans must subject themselves to the tutelage of the Westerner because their own tradition is inferior and anti-developmental."²⁸

Chapter Three avails us the opportunity to settle the controversy surrounding the meaning of Ifá: whether Ifá and Òrúnmìlà can be used interchangeably to refer to the Yorùbá deity of wisdom or not. Though a number of scholars, like Bascom and Abimbola, endorse the view that Ifá and Òrúnmìlà are interchangeable, their studies fail to produce textual evidence from the corpus in support of their claim. Finally, I endeavour to explicate how philosophical thinking, with the rise of modern science, began to lose its claim on wisdom as its defining characteristic and how Ifá emphasizes the ideal of wisdom and its ages-long affiliation to philosophy.

In Chapter Four, I examine the idea of Yorùbá ontology and show that cosmology and the concept of man are the basic components of the phenomenon. Under Yorùbá cosmology, I look at philosophical issues surrounding the concepts of Supreme Being (Olódùmarè) and spirits or divinities. I jettison the idea that the Yorùbá religion is polytheistic, despite the fact that this position seems to be attenuated by the several gods that the Yorùbá worship. I substantiate this position by rejecting the mechanistic view of the world that, from the standpoint of Ifá, runs contrary to the Yorùbá teleological view that Olódùmarè (God) is the creator of the universe. I also show how the Yorùbá conception of the universe—as that which is governed by two opposing forces, good and evil—evokes the classical Aristotelian teleological view of the world. I look at the Yorùbá concept of man, which engenders a discussion of the Yorùbá idea of human destiny. I show the different ways through which human destiny can be altered and how certain Ifá verses cast doubt on the fatalistic interpretation of Orí (destiny), arguing that such an interpretation does not accord with the deterministic attitude of the Yorùbá towards life.

In Chapter Five, I look at the nature and scope of epistemology, showing that knowledge is a universal phenomenon. I look at issues surrounding the admission of the existence of African epistemology and argue, against the provincial outlook of the advocates of a unique “mode of knowing,” that there are universally valid criteria of knowledge that allow people in different societies and cultures to share their views and experiences. I also delve into Ifá system and consider the possibility of epistemological relativism in Yorùbá epistemic system that shows that the paradigm of knowledge among the Yorùbá “stands in direct opposition to Western belief in the unity of nature and the attendant search for absolute certainty.”²⁹

In Chapter Six, I attempt a definition of ethics and examine the plausibility of Nietzsche’s claim that man is moral because of his weakness to challenge the dictates of his society. I examine the position of Ifá on whether religion is the basis of morality or not. I also look at what constitutes the good life from the standpoint of Ifá.

In Chapter Seven, I question the authoritarian nature of African gerontocratic society, which some thinkers have claimed is responsible for lack of sustained curiosity and interest in change in Africa. I show in Ifá system how the Yorùbá idea of gerontocracy allows the individual to express himself in society, contrary to the assumption that only the aged occupy critical spheres in society.

In Chapter Eight, I examine how Ifá deals with the problem of written-oral dichotomy that, among others, is responsible for the intransigent relationship that exists between the votaries of the two dominant schools in African philosophy, namely, the traditionalists and the universalists. I show that this intransigent relationship persists between the traditionalists and the insistent champions of literacy (the universalists) because the two groups have failed to recognize the need to furnish a paradigm of interaction or dialogue between the “oral” projects of the traditionalists and the “written” projects of the universalists. I show how Ifá rejects the oral/written dichotomy and explicates that this dichotomy is occasioned by provincial and parochial conceptions of philosophy on the part of the traditionalists and the universalists respectively.

Finally, in Chapter Nine, I argue that socio-political development has continued to elude Africa due to the persistence of the radical disjuncture in value orientation between the citizens and the leaders. I show how Ifá proposes a way of harmonizing the citizens and the state in order to engender meaningful developmental projects in Africa.

Ifa: The Yoruba god of Wisdom
A long tradition of hierarchical priesthood and a web of folklore
First published in The African Guardian March 13, 1986.

Kemi Atanda ILORI

In spite of the numerous articles and books devoted to it in recent years, Ifa remains an intractable subject for many, a bewildering cellar of ancient wisdom. And this is not only due to the complex web of fetish associated with it but also – and this is more important – to the paraphernalia and elaborate divination procedures incidental to Ifa.

As much the name of the patron deity as of the divination system itself, Ifa is similar in function and linked organically to other divination systems extant among the Igbo, the Nupe, the Jukun and Gwari peoples of Nigeria.

But this similarity cannot be pressed too far. For unlike these other systems the Ifa oracle has a long tradition of hierarchical priesthood, plus an inexhaustible fountain of lores, myths, taboos, etcetera which when appropriately recalled and chanted by the priest have celebrated redemptive powers.

Among the Yoruba, Ifa is revered not only for these redemptive powers but also for the cultural link it provides between man and the other gods. Esu – the erratic god – especially occupies place of prominence in Ifa divination rites. Through these rites the Yoruba mind communes both with its environment in terms of such phenomena as rain, drought, wind, fire, earth and such other elements; and, beyond them, with much more abstracted and practically invisible forces of nature.

Abundantly evident in the rituals of Ifa is man's wish to efface harsh reality, or merely to temper it and make it subservient to a rational and human order. The blind incomprehensible attributes of nature combine to form in man a sense of awe, of daring, of defeat and conquest. Tied in this way to the basic fears and dreams of man, to his means of survival and livelihood, it is not surprising that the origins of Ifa date back to the earliest times, to the origin of mankind itself.

According to one popular belief, Ifa or Orunmila as he is also called, was one of those gods who journeyed from heaven to earth to found the ancient Yoruba city, Ife-Ife. In Ife, he fathered eight children, practiced successfully his profession as seer and solver of all problems. He founded a cult of diviners, gathered a band of disciples and was wont to wander from city to city in the course of his profession. But Ifa was prone as much to humility as to pride and the impertinence of his youngest son, Olowe, caused him such annoyance that the god of wisdom decided to part ways with earthlings and journeyed back to heaven by the much climbed 'palm tree'.

Now it is easily guessed what would happen with the god of Wisdom and – by implication – of order absent from Earth. Chaos and upheaval swamped the land, unheard of events, extraordinary and terrifying in every detail started to occur. Hurriedly, the children of Orunmila were dispatched as ambassadors to their fathers to persuade the god to return to Earth. For undisclosed reasons however, Orunmila refused to accede to his children's wishes, sending each back, instead with sixteen palm nuts for use as guidance and succor in the daily affairs of life. Henceforth, these palm nuts or ikin in Yoruba, would become important totems of the god and his priests use them regularly when consulting Ifa.

At other times, especially when divining for clients, the priests may use opele, a divining string of nuts made from the opele tree (Schrebera golungensis). Divination begins with the client whispering his prayer into opele, or into a coin which he throws on the divining board. The priest casts his chain, observing meticulously the inner and outer surfaces of the nuts and the combinations of patterns they produce are vital codes of divination which only the priest can read.

If the picture is not clear enough the priest may seek further aid in the efficacious sacred cowrie and the sacred piece of bone. These are used in the manner of a touchstone mainly for casting lots. The priest is not limited to a single throw of the chain. In practice, he casts his chain several times recording the formation of the nuts in the yellowish powder, iyerosun, contained in the ornamented divining tray. To stimulate his memory and create a conducive environment, the priest uses a short ivory staff, iroke, to tap the tray rhythmically while he chants the relevant odu from the almost endless and untiring corpus of Ifa poems.

There are 256 volumes to this corpus, sixteen of them, lengthy in proportion and featuring the major subjects that may preoccupy the client, are commonly accepted as the principal ones. The remaining 249 volumes are of shorter poems that read normally as prefaces, addenda, or illustrations to the sixteen major categories. Each category or odu has its own signature tune, a combination of strokes made in the iyerosun accompanied by its own specific poem(s).

The 256 volumes are rich poetic stories grounded in the oral and folkloric culture of the Yoruba. Fleshly myths, tales, folklore and partly historical precedents are what we have in the volumes. Lyrical and sensitive, the treatments of these precedents is given in various pitches – from serious to the comical, the satirical to the basically realistic, and the exalted to the melodramatic. The only constant is Ifa's well famed abilities to solve all problems.

There are ceaseless declamations to these abilities, to the essentialness on the part of the client to comply with the instructions of Ifa, no matter how unfathomable, absurd, expensive or even trivial. And most of these instructions are, at least on the surface, of this nature. Sacrifices requiring parts of fish or bird or animal, topped with kola nuts, soaked in oil, wrapped in a piece of white cloth and left at the crossroads are common enough with Ifa.

At other times the sacrifice may be in the form of such edibles as fruits, tubers, palm-kernels, beans, bean cakes and groundnuts. In such instances the client may partake of these materials and even share with his household or with any group of persons instructed by Ifa. Most of these sacrifices are to placate the other gods, the client's personal spirit Ori, or the witches. The Yoruba believe in the efficacy of these sacrifices and Ifa's prescriptions are taken quite seriously, perhaps because many of these prescriptions are drawn directly from the Odu Ifa that concerns the client.

The Odu, however, in spite of its variety, its often expansive and almost limitless details, is not something structurally indeterminable. In fact, it has now become clear that the priest when chanting the Odu is not engaged in some unconscious process but in a highly controlled and artistically structured activity. Wande Abimbola, a noted Ifa lorist and researcher, has identified eight typical features of the basic Ifa poem. Though he does not discuss their role, these features are not more functional than stop-gaps or stanza margins intended to give the priest a moment to catch his breath or more, shuffle the details of his chosen poem – especially when he has to recite, sing or declaim, in turns, parts of these details. The competence of the priest is, among other ways, reflected in how carefully and correctly he can pick his way through the meaning, message and rites structurally integrated into each Odu.

The first feature of ese Ifa (Ifa poem) states the name(s) of the Ifa priest involved in a past divination while the second gives the name(s) of his client. The third discusses the reason(s) for the divination, the fourth giving the instructions of the priest. The fifth part tells whether or not the client obeyed these instructions. The sixth shows the result of the client's compliance or non-compliance, the seventh tells his reactions to his good fortune or misfortune. The eighth is a conclusive moral drawn from the whole story.

After the seventh part the Ifa priest may repeat parts I – VII all over again, for emphasis mainly. Let's for instance, take one short poem from Odu Eji Ogbe, the first volume in Ifa corpus, to illustrate these features. One will discover in this selection from Wande Abimbola's work, Ifa Divination Poetry, that as is typical with Ifa keekeke – short Ifa poems – not only these features but even meaning itself is tightly compressed.

And he performed the sacrifice.
As a result he became impregnable.
He said, "I lift up my arms

Ifa divination was performed for Orunmila
The father was told that he would not carry his responsibilities to the end of his life.
I will carry my own responsibilities to the end of my life.
I lift up my arms

At a glance we notice that lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 are instances of features, II, III, IV, V, VI, and VII respectively. Omitted are features I and VIII. In many Ifa poems, feature I is usually a nickname or the abbreviation of a long compound name of the Ifa priest(s) cited in the precedent. Of feature VIII, I find from the several poems of the corpus I read that moral messages are couched often obscurely though artistically in allusions, parodies, hyperboles, similes, metaphors and even onomatopoeia, such literary devices so ubiquitous in Ifa divination poetry. Not very often do you find the example cited below, also from one of Abimbola's works that is a blatant and unabashed tendency towards petty moralizations.

The lines below are pleas that the wicked should desist from wickedness.

In short, what appears important in most of Ifa poetry is not simply a line or two of moral platitudes but a total and effective description of those events that naturally bear them out. The sheer literariness of this description, its multifacetedness, its possibilities, contradictions and essential connection to the prevailing ethos of the society, especially, those sanctioned by the political culture, are aspects which space would not permit us to recall here.

But suffice to say that more than any other divination system along the West African coast, Ifa teems with every subject under the sun and presents its contents in highly graphic though not necessarily realistic details. The delivery is at once succinct and elaborate, concise and effusive, reflective both of the literary vastness of the Ifa corpus as much as of the training of its priests.

The pupil Ifa priest, is a youngster 10 to 15 years old who spend the next ten to twelve years as a devoted hardworking apprentice under some renowned master of the art. Even after these years, he has to practice under some supervision until he has been successfully inducted into the mysteries of the cult.

Upon his graduation, and depending on his own prowess and inclinations, the fledgling priest may choose or combine any of the five distinct cadres of Ifa priesthood: the diviner-healers, the diviners, the healers, the amateurs who divine solely for themselves and their households and, finally, the semi-qualified – those who are still on their post-graduation attachment.

The qualified priest is a totally divine person versed in the taboos, rites, recitals, and ceremonies of the cult. He guards jealously the paraphernalia of his profession, venerates his own mission and entirely respects the secrets of his client. He is usually full of assurance, of a settled disposition and dispassionate in his approach to men and matters. Wealth is not the center of his life but the happiness, health and progress he can bring to his community.

Politically, he is as much a tool in the hands of the rulers as in those of the commoners. But when he chooses to practice his art with a free conscience, self-restraint and in line with the dictates of his profession, he is the most respected, the most important person in the community and, not rarely, a scourge to injustice, inhumanity and impiety. Though today, his position and his cult are aspects of the fading traditional institutions of the Yoruba, it is still refreshing to watch him take his place during traditional festivals and such other ceremonies.

No doubt, modern systems of commerce and governance, new modes of living, the sophisticated urban centers, competing religions, all have conspired to seriously check the development and influence of the Ifa cult, one of the oldest and surviving souvenirs of Africa in such distant lands as Cuba, Haiti, Brazil and parts of America.

Yet, beyond the tarred roads, the zinc roofs, modern technology, antipathetic ideologies, opele occasionally finds its own place, and from the patterns indented in iyerosun, Ifa speaks across the great divide guiding his own to their final and happy destinies.

African tribal history, legends, customs and religious beliefs

Vusamazulu
Credo Mutwa

In these pages, Vusamazulu Credo Mutwa tears aside the veil of secrecy that for centuries has concealed the truth about African tribal history and of their customs and religious beliefs.

He believes that it is only by revealing the truth that has, in terms of tribal law, been deliberately distorted from time immemorial to deceive and confuse the enemy—be they White or Black—that there can be any hope of bridging the racial gulf, the utter failure of one race of human beings to understand what goes on in the minds of the other.

In telling the story of African tribal life since the time of the Phoenicians he recounts fascinating fables and legends handed down from one generation to another. In some of these are to be found possible solutions to several of the most baffling of African enigmas.

One of its most striking features is the way the book is written, revealing Mutwa's remarkable command of the English language.

From chapter to chapter and sometimes from paragraph to paragraph he changes his style of writing to suit his subject. At times it is a classic English, at others the strange, flowing idiom of the Bantu.

By the use of fact and fable Mutwa takes the African mind and lays it bare, sparing no feelings. It is not a book, he says, for people who prefer

PROLOGUE

THESE are the stories that old men and old women tell to boys and girls seated with open mouths around the spark-wreathed fire in the centre of the villages in the dark forests and on the aloe-scented plains of Africa.

Under the gaze of the laughing stars the Old One sits, his kaross wrapped around his age-blasted shoulders, staring with rheumy eyes at the semi-circle of eager expectant faces before him—faces of those who have taken but a few steps along the dark and uncertain footpath called Life—faces of the ones as yet oblivious to the pain of life's bitter scourges—faces as yet unmarked by furrows of bitterness, ill-health and anger—the fresh, pure, open faces of . . . children.

The fire dances in the middle of the round clay fireplace like a virgin revelling in the simple joy of being alive. It devours the dry twigs and logs that a little girl is constantly feeding it, leaving nothing but glowing ashes. It mocks the silent sky with a redly luminous column of smoke against its starry face and by sending up short-lived stars of its own.

Suddenly the Old One feels a great burden on his shoulders—a heavy responsibility towards the young ones sitting so expectantly around him. Suddenly there is a visible sag to his thin, aged shoulders. He sighs—a harsh, rasping sound—and clears his throat, spitting and blowing his nose into the fire, as his father and his father's father did before him. And he begins the story—the old, old story which he knows he must repeat exactly as he heard it so long ago, without changing, adding or subtracting a single word: “Indaba, My Children,”

It is through these stories that we are able to reconstruct the past of the Bantu of Africa. It is through these stories that intertribal friendship or hatred was kept alive and burning; that the young were told who their ancestors were, who their enemies were and who their friends were. In short, it is these stories that have shaped Africa as we know it—years and years ago

True, the Black man of Africa had no mighty scrolls on which to write the history of his land. True, the Black tribes of Africa had no pyramids on which to carve the history of each and every crowned thief and tyrant who ruled them—on which to carve the history of every battle lost and won. But this they did, and still do!

There are men and women, preferably with black birth-marks on either palm of the hands, with good memories and a great capacity to remember words and to repeat them exactly as they had heard them spoken. These people were told the history of the Tribes, under oath never to alter, add or to subtract any word. Anyone who so much as thought of changing any of the stories of his tribe that he had been told fell immediately under a High Curse which covered him, his children and his children's children. These tribal story-tellers were called Guardians of the Umlando or Tribal History.

And I, Vusamazulu the Outcast, am proud to be one of these, and here I shall tell these stories to you in the very words of the Guardians who told them to me.

"Indaba—My Children . . ."

INTRODUCTION

MANY strange things have happened in Africa; things that have puzzled, disgusted and shocked the world, especially in recent years; things for which the world has had little or no explanation and things that can best be explained by first laying bare—to the rest of humanity—the strange working of the mind of the African.

Many will find it hard to believe much of what I have revealed in this book, but I am not in the least concerned, because whether I am believed or not, everything I write here is true.

Much of what I shall reveal here will shock and anger many people—most of all my fellow Bantu, who resent having their doings and secrets exposed to foreigners. By writing many of these things, I am becoming, in terms of our tribal laws, a traitor to my own race. And this is going to make me hold back much of what I should also reveal. Terrible as the stigma of traitor is, I shall risk bearing it in the belief that what I am doing here will help my people in the end. Only time will tell whether I am right or wrong. There has been much suffering and bloodshed in Africa in recent years—bloodshed that has led to hatred and still more suffering. And the most pathetic thing about it is that much of this could have been prevented had the White rulers of Africa had a better knowledge and a better understanding of the way a Black man's mind works than they do, even now.

Kenya's Mau Mau uprising, Angola's rebellion, the massacres in the Congo, riots and killings in South Africa—all soon to be written in blood permanently on the highway of human history, all soon to be written in bleached bones on the desert of time—all were started by one thing—the total lack of understanding between Black and White; the utter failure of one race of human beings to understand what goes on in the minds of the other race.

The saddest thing is that the misunderstanding is mostly on one side—the more powerful side of the two—the White man's side. If any Black man with a little knowledge of English, French or Portuguese wants to study the White man—as I have done—all he has to do is to go into the nearest town and become a regular customer of one of the second-hand bookshops there. He must buy and read no less than twenty different kinds of books and magazines a month for a period of no less than 10 years. He must read classics philosophical works and even cheap murder mysteries and science fiction. He must read Homer, Virgil, Aristotle, and the rest. He must turn the pages of Walter Scott, Voltaire or Peter Cheyney. He must read the newspapers with great care.

Gradually, as the years pass, he will gain more or less a clear understanding of the White man, his way of life, his hopes and ambitions. But few White people have ever bothered to study the African people carefully—and by this I do not mean driving round the African villages taking photographs of dancing tribesmen and women and asking a few questions, and then going back and writing a book—a useless book full of errors, wrong impressions and just plain nonsense. Many of the books written by Europeans about Africans should be relegated to the dustbin.

There are doctors, missionaries and scientists who have spent years and years among Africans—many of them can even speak the local language better than the indigenous people—but what they know about them as human beings amounts to nothing. Many have studied the African only to compare him with the White man—intellectually for instance. Many more have studied the African in order to find justification for the policies of the ruling group they work for and support.

I once heard a well-known and respected White intellectual state that when Zulus perform a war dance before going into battle they are dancing themselves into a frenzy of rage and showing what they are going to do to their enemies on the battlefield. This statement, logical though it may sound, is as far from the truth as the Day Star is from the worm crawling on a rotten pumpkin.

Another fallacy dear to many people, both overseas and in South Africa, is that Africans practise polygamy as a sign of wealth and prestige. And if that is so then I, Vusamazulu Mutwa, am the favourite 'wife' of the first High Chief of Ashanti! Ask any anthropologist in South Africa who was the greatest Zulu King and he will reply instantly: "Tshaka, of course". That is not so; Tshaka (or Shaka) was not the great Chief White historians make him out to be.

Thus you see what I am trying to achieve with this book: simply to lay the foundation for better understanding between two different types of human beings, by destroying wrong notions and false 'facts', and exposing much of what must be known at the risk of censure by both Black and White people.

There is a saying dear to lawyers that Justice cannot be founded on lies. and I think the same is true with human association and mutual trust and understanding. A marriage of persons who fear and distrust each other cannot long survive, nor can one where the partners hold false ideas about each other.

The same is true between races in any country. There can be no real understanding between them so long as neither has a clear picture of the other: what it really thinks, believes in, hopes for, and why. You cannot found friendship on faulty guesswork because guessing breeds suspicion, hate and bloodshed. And there is much that is guesswork between Black and White. Many of the so-called problems facing Africa today can be traced back to foolish acts on the part of one or other of the two races in the past: acts that were the result of lack of understanding. Only by being presented with a full, clear and unvarnished picture of the African—seen from his worst as well as his best side—can the White man hope to avoid repeating the incredible mistakes he made in the past, blunders that have cost Africa a lot of suffering and close to three million human lives in the short space of 10 years.

Why, so great is the lack of understanding between White and Black that there are Africans—hundreds of them—who still believe, in this jet and sputnik age, that White people never mate as common human beings do; that White women do not bear their children in the painful way Black mamanas bear their piccanins . . . but that they lay shining glass eggs that hatch out little Bwanas a day after being laid! Surprising? May be, but it is true!

Thousands of Black people in Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa attribute godlike and terrible powers to Whites. They believe that White people are the sons of some great living flower that grows somewhere under the “restless, cold, passionless seas” and that blond Europeans are half-human and half-plant (because, they argue, who ever saw yellow hair on a human head, yellow hair like that which one sees on the “head” of a mealie cob?).

So great is the lack of understanding between Black and White in Africa that there are White men who refuse to accept the fact that a Black man is a human being like the Indian, the Coloured, the Chinese and the European himself. They would rather die than accept the fact that there are Black artists, sculptors, builders, teachers and the like. These people believe nothing else about Africans but that they are lazy, stupid, stubborn creatures, something between an ape and a human being. In my travels through South Africa and beyond. I have met hundreds of such White men and women.

Hence this book . . .

“You cannot fight an evil disease with sweet medicine,” is the saying popular amongst us witchdoctors. And one cannot hope to cure a putrid malady like inter-racial hatred and misunderstanding by mincing words. So I warn readers that they are in for a nasty shock. This is not a book for people who prefer hypocrisy to fact. In this book the love life of many African tribes will be openly and frankly discussed, as will their religious beliefs, their crafts, and so forth. In later chapters you will read about the African peoples of the present time, their strange and varied reactions to civilization and also what they think about events in Africa today.

You will read about many things that have been deliberately withheld from the world—things that are common knowledge to all African people within the shores of this continent.

In offering this information to the world, I do not claim it to be the last word—the book to end all books. I intend this book to be the forerunner of many more to come, and one to pave the way for other African writers, some of whom may have amassed much more knowledge of our fatherlands in the course of their lives than I have done. As I also said at the outset, the second most important purpose of this book is to shatter many fallacies that have become accepted as facts through the years for the simple reason that nobody has ever questioned their accuracy or dared give the other side of the story, as, for instance, the facts in the case of the killing of the White Voortrekker, Piet Retief, by the Zulu King, Dingana (which I shall disclose in a subsequent chapter).

In order to best understand this book, the reader should be given a glimpse into the life of the author.

I am a Native of South Africa, a Zulu from the province of Natal. My father is a former Catholic catechist from the turbulent district of Embo in the south of Natal.

My mother Nomabunu is the daughter of Ziko Shezi, an Induna and veteran of the battle of Ulundi, which ended the Zulu War. He was also a confirmed High Witchdoctor and a custodian of the relics of our tribe and Guardian of our Tribe's History.

Because my mother, a 'heathen', refused to be converted to Christianity, my parents parted just after I was born. I grew up under the protection of my grandfather, and was initiated as his attendant who carried his medicine bags for him, thus sharing some of his forbidden secrets.

In 1928 my father came and asked permission of my grandfather to take me away and because of my being an illegitimate child and therefore a disgrace to Ziko's family, my grandfather (Ziko himself) agreed, despite my mother's protests.

My father and stepmother, their three children and myself, came to the Transvaal in the middle of the same year. We lived on a farm beyond Potchefstroom, my father being a labourer there, and it was here in 1932 that my stepbrother Emmanuel died after being whipped by the farmer, my father's employer, under circumstances which are best left undisclosed.

For the next 20 years we lived on different farms and then lastly at the mine where my father still works today as a carpenter. This mine is in the southern suburbs of Johannesburg.

In 1954 I found myself employment in one of Johannesburg's leading curio shops, a shop specializing in African art. Except for six months when I was working in a pottery firm, I have been employed there ever since.

Being an amateur artist of sorts, I have travelled quite widely in the country of my birth, first with Catholic priests in 1946 and 1948 and then with my present employer in 1958.

On returning from Rhodesia that year I visited my mother and grandfather in Zululand after more than 30 years and, at their command, I renounced Christianity and underwent the 'Ceremony of Purification' in order to begin training as a witchdoctor and also in preparation for assuming the post of Custodian of our sacred Tribal Relics, in the event of my grandfather's death.

I have now completed my training as a medicine man, and have gained a lot of knowledge that I shall lay out in this book.

In March 1960, a young Basuto woman whom I loved, and hoped to wed in place of my present faithless spouse, was among those who died when police fired on the crowd at Sharpeville, near Vereeniging.

On the night before she was to be buried her parents, her brother and two sisters, and three of their children, cut off tufts of their hair and threw them into her still open coffin, swearing to avenge her if it took them a million years, even if they should die in doing so. I took what is called a 'Chief's Great Blood Oath', cutting a vein in my hand (the left one) and letting ten drops of blood flow into one of the gaping bullet wounds that defiled her dark brown slender body, swearing to tell the world the truth about the Bantu people and so save many of my countrymen the agony of the bereavement we felt. I swore to do this, come imprisonment, torture or death, and even if the very fires of Hell or the cold of Eternal Darkness stood in my way.

This book is only the beginning of the fulfilment of my oath, an oath whose keeping has become the only purpose of my intolerable life, and which will still be binding on my children and their children's children. So, even if this manuscript is destroyed, I shall write other works like it until one of them does get published—be it after my death.

SPAWN OF THE DRAGON

SIMBA the lion was old. Simba the lion was weak—mad with hunger and frustration. There is nothing more terrible for a beast once strong than to find itself slowly succumbing to the ravages of old age. And, in the hostile forest, age is the greatest and most final calamity that can befall a living creature, be it lion or antelope.

Antelopes that feel the onset of old age in the weakness it brings to their swift limbs, know that the stream of their lives has at last run dry. They know that for them the hour of Kalunga, the God of Death, has come and, when the herd madly flees from the smell of lions, they will be forced to lag behind—an easy prey even to the most inexperienced young lion.

The lion who feels the icy claws of old age slowly paralyzing his mighty leaping muscles, and who feels the dizziness of old woman Time clouding his mind and dimming his eyes, comes inevitably to realise that he had already hunted his last impala, and that for him the sun of life is setting in a blaze of gold, scarlet and purple.

So, Simba the lion was lying under the young musharagi tree not far from a sluggish river bordered by rustling reeds, and in whose cool bosom a herd of water beasts bathed lazily, their enormous bodies protruding like so many smooth glistening rocks in the rippling waters.

One of the water beasts raised its ugly head and yawned hugely, exposing blunt tusks insultingly in the direction of the slowly weakening lion with the golden light of the setting sun full on his face. The lazy breeze of sunset was softly playing with his ancient mane, and the tall grass through which his head was barely visible.

Among the reeds bordering the river something moved and a sacred flamingo rose into the forest-scented air, slowly beating its graceful pinkish-white wings as it crossed the river to join three of its females on the other side. But Simba the lion had no eyes for all this; the forest had lost its magic. The silvery river with its water beasts, its nesting flamingoes and playful otters had lost its enchantment. The only voice for which he had ears was the voice of hunger growing savagely in his famished, shrunken belly. The only music for which he had ears was the song of starvation roaring like a wild tempest through the caverns and tunnels of his dulled mind.

Aieeee! Simba the lion would have given his eyes, yea, his very life for just a mouthful of meat from the side of a wildebeest three days dead! Surely anything, no matter how putrid and vile, any worm-crawling carrion, was better than a slow death of starvation. In vain the old lion wished that just one thin, spavined antelope should pass within reach of his age-numbed claws. He had not eaten for three whole days.

It was cruelly strange to see that the older one grew the faster the impalas and zebras seemed to be. Why were these wretched creatures so incredible? Did they not know that they were created by the Great Ones for the sole benefit of lions? A vision of a herd of zebras floated briefly across the troubled skies of his disordered mind. A million curses on the striped over-fat wretched brutes! Why did the Great Spirit have to give them such swift feet?

The old lion's thoughts were cleaved abruptly by an interruption. They faded out like morning mist before the rising sun and old Simba lifted his battered head with a start! Something was coming . . . and it was coming his way!

With a cautiousness born of years of bitter experience Simba lowered his scarred head until he was looking through the long elephant grass, rather than over it. He breathed a deep breath of living air. Eyah! there was no doubt about it—the strange scent was there and it was getting stronger. Whatever was coming was taking its time. But of one thing the old lion was now sure—it was some kind of food that was coming his way! Fresh and vibrant strength poured like liquid fire along his spine. His excited tail slowly stiffened and a low growl of satisfaction involuntarily pushed itself forth from the depths of his ancient chest, to be promptly stilled by the voice of experience. Nothing must give the approaching prey a hint of his presence. Silence now . . . absolute silence . . .

It seemed as if the very stream of Time had come to a standstill as the lion waited; the forest, the river and everything about his environment suddenly assumed an odd unreality. Then they casually emerged into view . . . strolling slowly through the long grass . . . Human Beings!

There were two of the creatures—male and female. And old Simba narrowed his yellow eyes as he contemplated their approach. They were walking for all the world as if they owned the forest—as if all the trees and the mighty ageless river belonged to them or their fathers. They were walking as if they were the chief and chieftainess of Creation. Simba the lion watched them coldly and in his animal mind took in each detail of their features and attire, as they drew nearer and nearer . . . and their scent grew stronger in his anxious nostrils!

The female was the Spirit of Beauty personified. She was Perfection in a most perfect form. She was not only beautiful, but she radiated beauty as a hot stone radiates heat. The waiting Simba could sense the great beauty of the human female and he could sense also the great goodness in her soul. He beheld the sensitive beauty of her face, the oval face with its round prominent forehead, its clear eyes that scanned the world with an expression of deep wonder. He noticed the small flat nose and the tiny nostrils, well placed above a smiling mouth. A mischievous goddess had placed that mouth there as a trap with which to catch the lips of men.

She was the essence of purest perfection. Some Goddess of Skill must have spent days of precious time moulding each bulge and curve of that heavenly physique. This woman was living beauty carved in dark brown musharagi—a statue of perfection carved in living ebony.

Her attire was simple indeed: she wore a short skirt of tanned cheetah skin heavily trimmed with cowrie shells around the hems. Bracelets of copper and ivory flourished on her arms and around her neck blazed a necklace of bright copper oblongs engraved with signs of secret wisdom. Her hair was combed up into two lobes, a hairstyle known as the 'ears of the caracal'—the oldest hairstyle in the Land of the Tribes. Sacred cowrie shells decorated her soft hair and a beautifully carved comb of ivory showed in the back of her head.

The old lion did not know it, of course, but he was looking at the most famous and most beautiful woman that ever lived—Marimba, the daughter of Odu and the incomparable Amarava, Mother of Nations. He was looking at the woman who gave the tribes some of the oldest and most beautiful songs on earth and who invented countless musical instruments, each destined to carry her name in some form or other—Marimba, the Mother of Music.

The man was tall and slender, but strongly built. His face was not handsome, but it was determined and manly, like the rest of his body. And whereas the woman beside him was beauty incarnate, he was the personification of strength and invincible loyalty. He wore a crude loinskin around his manly hips and a band of python skin around his head. A necklace of the teeth of hyænas was around his muscle-corded neck, while a solitary bracelet of copper shone on his right forearm. In his left hand he held a crude shield of buffalo skin while in his right he carried a weighty harpoon of wood, tipped with a flake from the shin-bone of a giraffe. He carried this strange weapon because at this time the tribes had not yet learned the secret of extracting the hard iron from the ironstone. That knowledge was brought to this continent by the Strange Ones very many generations after the events here mentioned occurred. Only copper was known to our ancestors at this stage and this metal was too soft for use in weapons. It was good only for ornaments.

The old lion waited quietly while the two human beings drew closer. The forest and the river seemed to vanish and in the lion's eyes only the two humans had any substance—only them he now saw, to the exclusion of all else.

He saw how the man's eyes never left the bewitching face of the woman by his side—how he looked for all the world like an impala helplessly caught in the hypnotic spell of a glittering python. He could see how the man smiled at her gently, reassuringly, and spoke softly to her as if trying to banish the great sadness that clouded her gentle eyes—a sadness that the old lion could sense was clouding the soul of the beautiful human female, like a foul storm-cloud clinging and obstructing from view the snowy top of a beautiful peak.

Then it dawned on the old lion that the human female was trying to urge her man to go back with her to where both came from and not to penetrate the forest any deeper. The unusually beautiful woman had a premonition of danger. But just then something happened which left both humans paralysed with fear and which gave old Simba the golden opportunity he had been waiting for! A bird of thunder—an eagle—had been circling high in the heavens for some time and now this rider of the storm suddenly dived from the red, blue and gold expanse of the sunset sky. He dived with wings partly spread and cruel talons fully at the ready to grab what his keen eyes had spotted. He passed directly over the heads of the startled humans, fanning them with the wind of his fearful passage. He dived into the tall grass to their left and shot up again into the glowing heavens—a young steenbuck struggling in terror in the grip of those pitiless claws.

While the shocked humans stood rooted to the ground, numbed by this awful and rare omen of violent death, old Simba gathered every ounce of his fast-ebbing strength, and launched himself in an all but feeble charge!

Marimba felt the heavy blow that struck her on the side of her head, sending her reeling to the ground, straight into the dark valleys of unconsciousness. She did not see her fearless husband hurl himself upon the lion that had brought her down. She did not see how his bone harpoon glanced aside harmlessly from the shaggy flank of the hunger-demented beast. Neither did she see how he, with a strength above the strength of an ordinary man, threw himself barehanded upon the snarling lion and dragged it off her. She did not see her husband locked in mortal battle with the lion whose claws all but tore his strong body to shreds. And she did not see the shaggy maned savage beast drag the limp form of her lord and husband away through the tall grass.

Simba the lion had found a meal at last.

And the Princess Marimba, Chieftainess of the Wakambi Tribe, had lost yet another husband, the second husband she had lost since the cruel Goddess of Evil, the night-walking Watamaraka, had laid a curse upon her. The Mother of Demons had one day approached her and commanded the shocked daughter of Odu and Amarava to become one of her handmaidens in the Land of Darkness, and this Marimba had flatly refused to do. Watamaraka then placed a curse upon Marimba saying that any man she would love and marry would die violently, and in her presence, within three moons of their marriage. Exactly three moons after the curse was pronounced, Marimba's husband, the hunter Zumangwe whom she had married sixteen years earlier and who was the father of her young son, had been trampled to death by a rogue elephant.

Marimba and the boy Kahawa had managed to escape by climbing a tall tree and had watched in horror as the head of their home met his untimely death almost immediately below them. Two years later Marimba had married again, and in order to prevent the curse of Watamaraka from being fulfilled, the Princess Marimba had kept her new husband a virtual prisoner for two whole moons, confined to the village of the Wakambi and never allowed him to go out with the other men on a hunt.

But the man had tired of being protected like an overgrown child by a woman. He wanted to face the perils of the forest and risk his life as all brave men should. Marimba had pleaded again and again, resorting to all her womanly subterfuges to keep her lord and husband at home. Finally Marimba had to give in to her valiant consort; she allowed him to go into the forest, but provided she could accompany him, hoping he would then exercise greater care.

They had spent the whole day in the forest and as the time passed she felt the voice of presentiment growing in her heart. She began to beg her husband to return home with her. But he, the stubborn, stupid and stone-headed fool, had laughed at her fears and had assured her that nothing would happen. It had been in the course of their tenth argument that afternoon that Simba the lion pounced upon them.

Now, the sun slowly set beyond the mountains to the west, and as the skies swept their blazing farewell to the departing Lord of Day, the Princess Marimba lay unconscious in all her beauty in the long grass while the water beasts began to leave the gurgling mud to commence their greedy nightly grazing. The sacred flamingoes gracefully retired to their mud and reed nests. And in the silent distance there came the faint sound of a hunter's horn. It sounded once, twice, thrice, and then it was silent again.

A search party of Wakambi warriors was on its way to find out what had happened to their beloved princess and her consort—why they had not returned to the crude settlement of caves and huts which the Wakambi, the Tribe of Wanderers, knew as their home. In the long elephant grass the breezes of sunset fanned the soul of the beautiful Marimba back from the land of Nothingness and she stirred. She sat up with a blinding headache that dimmed her vision.

The first thing she saw was blood—slowly drying blood all over the patch of trampled down grass, the unmistakable signs of a violent struggle. “My husband!” was the first thought that came to her mind. Struggling against the mists of shock and apprehension Marimba tried to stand up. But she fell back and could only lie flat on her back, quite helpless.

Then out of the empty air above her a bright bronze-coloured apparition took shape. Watamaraka, the Mother of all Demons, presented herself in visible form, with a cruel smile on her dark lips.

“You will look around for your husband in vain, Oh Marimba: he is in a land far from here, beyond the seventh gateway of creation—the Land of Forever-Night.”

“My husband . . . dead! How can he be dead? I tried to tell him!”

“You poor babbling fool,” murmured Watamaraka. “I told you that every man you marry would die violently within three moons of your marriage, did I not?”

Fires of hate and fierce anger flamed in the gentle breast of the beautiful Marimba and words of wanton harshness spilled like a fierce torrent from her lovely mouth: “You pitiless blackhearted sexless monster! You foul witch from the lowest pits of hell! So you would place a curse on my head, would you? But I can yet defeat your vile schemes. I have already made up my mind that I shall never love another man again.”

“You stupid human beings! You are all the same, whether mortal or immortal,” purred Watamaraka nastily. “You make a lot of wonderful resolutions, you swear a lot of oaths to do this and not to do that. You bind yourselves with promises without first studying your secret natures—without knowing yourselves first. You never size up your ability to keep your oaths. And you say you will never marry again, my little ugly cockroach!”

“Ayieeee!” flared Marimba, “I shall never marry again, I swear by my mother’s sacred breasts.” Her voice rose to a mad shriek.

“Look down there,” smiled Watamaraka, pointing down to Marimba’s jutting breasts, “What is the purpose of those, do you think?”

“What have my breasts to do with my oath?”

The harsh voice of the evil goddess turned soft and gentle as she said to the angry and frightened widow: “Marimba, you are a very beautiful and desirable woman. And you, the youngest of the few immortals left upon this earth, have one very delightful weakness which you inherited from your mother, Amarava, long before she came under my spell. You know well enough what I am referring to. That weakness will force you to marry again in exactly twelve moons from now. And once again you will suffer the pain of my curse; within three moons of your marriage your husband will die violently and evilly in your presence, and I shall stand nearby and laugh! Until then, farewell, namirika!”

“Namirika!”^{*}—the unfriendly epithet was more than adequate to describe

^{*}An old Wakambi word which has no exact equivalent in English. In that language it would have a very vulgar meaning, but not in its Bantu sense. Literally, it combines the two words ‘tich’ and ‘lips’. It is used to describe a woman who has an insatiable thirst for a man.

the great weakness that the Wakambi princess had. But she was shocked at hearing this accusation hurled at her for the first time in her life—and by her arch enemy of all creatures. The Queen of Falsehoods had spoken the truth for once and this truth had brought Marimba face to face with the realities of her character. She now saw herself exactly for what she was, not the wise and tender-hearted ruler of the first tribe ever organised in the land—the first tribe ruled not by force but by wisdom and love. She saw herself not as the loving mother of a boy wiser than his fifteen tender years and braver than a thousand lions, but as a very ordinary, frail woman tormented by the unceasing demands of her own exotic body. The silent forest suddenly seemed to possess voices. The distant tree trunks seemed to have grown faces and eyes that leered at her and mouths that laughed hideously. “Oh no!” gasped Marimba. And just as she lapsed once again into the valleys of unconsciousness she heard the harsh brazen laughter of the Mother of Demons rippling through the forest as the triumphant goddess took her departure to the Land of Forever-Night.

Oko! For the beautiful one this was not only the day of soul-searing sadness and cruel bereavement; it was the day of self-revelation too. And this day which comes to all of us sooner or later in the course of our lives on this earth is the most painful in a human being's existence. Many of us go through the swamplands and deserts of life swathed in a glossy kaross of self-delusion. We deceive ourselves into believing that we are wise, strong and invincible, and that in all the world there is no one like oneself. We believe this until the day when we have to stand and look down upon the false images of ourselves lying shattered at our feet. And on that day we discover that we are the exact opposite of what we thought we were.

Thus it was with the Princess Marimba on the day her lord and husband died—that day when Time itself was still in its infancy, so many hundreds of generations ago.

She had been firm in her belief that she was wise and strong enough to withstand the savage onslaughts of cruel fate. But she never realised that every human being born of a woman carries in him, or her, the seeds of his or her undoing. Even as she lapsed into unconsciousness Marimba knew with a sick feeling in the valleys of her mind that she would marry again and that she would suffer bereavement once again.

* * * * *

Kahawa, the son of Marimba, was very angry; his young eyes were red from weeping and he could not sleep. He was angry with his dead stepfather for having exposed his dear mother to the dangers of the forest in spite of her warnings and protests. He was also angry with his stepfather for having been foolish enough to let a lion, and an old lame one at that, eat him. The tall, stone-headed, stupid son of a club-footed hyæna should have known better than to let himself get killed and so make the incomparable Marimba and the whole of the Wakambi tribe unhappy. Serve the stupid wretch right! Did he not know that his wife was an immortal and that her words and her warnings had to be obeyed and heeded? “Good riddance!” thought the boy coldly. “Now my mother can concentrate on ruling the tribe instead of spending the greater part of the day in that silly fool's arms!”

It was well known that Kahawa had intensely disliked his stepfather while he lived, and he disliked him even more now that he was dead. He could not understand his mother's grief. Why, that idle good-for-nothing was much better off dead, so why waste tears over him?

Kahawa let out a snort of anger and turned over on his left side on his bed of skins and dry grass in the cave. He stared angrily at the pale silver moon through the mouth of the cave. He heard the distant low wailing of the women of the settlement who were gathered in the Great Hut to mourn with their Chieftainess the death of her husband. He also heard the low groans of the two thousand warriors who were gathered, fully armed with clubs and bone-tipped harpoons, outside the Great Hut to pay tribute to the dead Royal Consort.

All these sounds disgusted Kahawa, and he was still snorting his anger at the moon like a young buffalo bull when the open entrance of the cave was briefly darkened by a fat silhouette. His best friend, Mpushu the Cunning, entered and sat down near the entrance, regarding the son of his beloved Chieftainess with the usual expression of admiration on his fat, sweaty and fish-like face.

"I see you, Oh Mpushu," said Kahawa.

Mpushu's ivory-white teeth gleamed in the moonlight against the ebony of his oily face. "And I see you too, Oh Eagle of Marimba."

"You are well known for an early sleeper, Oh Mpushu, so pray tell me, what brings you out at this time of the night?"

Mpushu's face seemed to grow oilier. His big round eyes seemed about to fly out of their sockets and he swallowed noisily once or twice. And then he just sat staring at Kahawa—his big mouth opening and shutting. He was obviously lost in the forests of fear.

"Has the Hyæna of Darkness eaten your tongue, Oh Mpushu?" asked Kahawa. "Why is it that you do not talk, Oh my friend?"

"This unworthy one is afraid to arouse the anger of the Royal One," said Mpushu softly. "This lowly Mpushu is afraid to be burned by the sun that is the wrath of Kahawa."

"Mpushu," Kahawa said gently, "to me you are like a brother and I have always found reason to be thankful for your advice. Speak your mind and tell me what troubles you so."

"Eagle of Marimba," said Mpushu after a short silence, "Mpushu never worries about himself but for the prince who honours him with his friendship. And while this unworthy lay on his side in his hut early this night he heard men whispering outside."

"The ears of Mpushu are sharper than the bone needles the women use for sewing skin blankets together and his brain is more cunning than that of the jackal in the forest. Tell me, Oh Mpushu, what were the men whispering about?"

"The miserable sons of tree-dwelling monkeys were speaking ill of my prince Kahawa," growled Mpushu. "It was that night-walking charlatan Somojo and that fat fool Kiambo. They were saying it was a thing of deep disgrace that the Eagle of Marimba was not showing his sorrow for his dead stepfather by standing outside the Great Hut in armed vigil as the rest of the Wakambi men are doing. Kiambo even went as far as to say that Kahawa seems pleased that his royal stepfather has gone to the land of Forever-Night."

"The miserable fat hyæna is quite right!" cried Kahawa savagely. "I am glad that my stepfather is dead, and tomorrow I intend to go into the council hut and tell these back-biting jackals so to their faces! I loathed the man while he lived and I hate him still though he is dead."

Mpushu wiped his sweaty face with the back of his hand and the expression on his cunning face became even more fish-like as he said: "Eagle of Marimba, there are times when a man must swallow his pride and push his personal likes and dislikes into the depths of the darkest forests of his mind and do things which he would never have dreamt of doing. And for you, my prince, such a time has come."

"If you think that I must pretend—and like a hypocrite mourn a man I hated; Oh Mpushu, then you can go back to sleep, because that I shall never do. I have never pretended in all my life and I shall not start now."

"Eagle of Marimba," insisted Mpushu calmly, "when you are a chief, or the son of one, there are things you have to do simply for appearance's sake, simply for the benefit of the stupid fools you rule, even if such things go against your feelings and your pride and conscience. A chieftain must hold the love and respect and the esteem of his subjects, always, otherwise he is lost. A chief or a prince must avoid being the laughing stock of his people, or evoke their scorn, because once that happens he is a chief no more. And your obvious pleasure at the death of your stepfather is fast making you the laughing stock of the Wakambi, Oh Royal Kahawa."

"What are they laughing at me for?" demanded Kahawa hotly.

"As they went away I heard Kiambo and Somojo agreeing that you are a petty-minded fool who carries hatred to ridiculous levels, to beyond the grave . . ."

"What!" cried Kahawa furiously, leaping to his feet and reaching for his spear. "The foul beasts dare insult me, the son of Marimba! Their muddy sour apology for blood shall redden my spear!"

"Killing those two will only make matters worse, Oh my prince," said Mpushu calmly. "Violence and force are sure signs of failure on the part of the ruler, Eagle of Marimba. Killing his own people can only increase a ruler's unpopularity."

"Well?" cried Kahawa fiercely, "what do you then suggest I should do? Do you want me to go out there and kiss the buttocks of the men who have insulted me?"

"No, my Lord, I would never dream of suggesting that you do something so easy. But I do suggest that early tomorrow morning you and I go out into the forest, hunt the lion that ate your stepfather, kill it and bring its head here for the rest of the people to see. That would greatly impress our tribe and make you very popular."

"And it would also please my poor mother!" cried Kahawa, becoming quite excited about this brilliant suggestion. "Oh Mpushu, you are the very fountain of wisdom!"

"I believe so . . . yes," said Mpushu modestly.

Kahawa was so excited by the prospect of the coming lion hunt that he could not sleep that night. It was months since he had killed a lion and if there was one kind of beast that the son of Marimba wanted to wipe out of existence it was lion. Kahawa hated this kind of animal only a shade less than he hated his stepfather, and deep in his rebellious and turbulent soul this youth nursed a profound contempt for the custom of his tribe of first asking the gods for permission to kill lions.

When dawn stained the eastern skies a pink-red, Kahawa deliberately omitted to perform the lion-hunter's ceremony and to request Heaven's permission. He was content with washing his face, gargling with water mixed with powdered mbaba root, and combing his hair with a four-toothed ivory comb. Seizing his bone-tipped spears and elephant-skin shield, he rushed out to wait for his friend Mpushu at the gate of the vast Wakambi settlement.

At the gate the young prince waited with fuming impatience and he watched as the slowly rising sun sent its first rays to bathe the huts of the settlement where his mother ruled the first organised tribe in the land. It was a tribe of nomads and pioneers, the first Bantu to penetrate the land which in later years was to be known as Tanga-Nyika. Still later, the northern division would be known as Lu-Kenya. This great settlement was built near the top of a steep hill, and it circled this hill as a 'headband of honour' around a bald chief's head. A heavy palisade of thick logs with a solitary gate went round the outside of the settlement like some formidable diadem. Behind this stockade were five thousand huts. These huts were crude and rather ugly compared with those built many generations later. The upper reaches of the hill was honey-combed with caves and natural shelters, where lived those of the Wakambi who disliked the too modern idea of huts.

The Wakambi had fortified their settlement, not against attack by men because, as far as they knew, they were the only representatives of the human race in the fantastic and frightening land, but against the terrible beasts which no story-teller must ever describe—beasts known simply as the Dija-Nwana, or 'Night Howlers'. These terrible demons loved to raid human villages during their mating season in the first moon of summer, and they would carry away men, women and children and devour these in their dark dens on the shores of the mighty lake of the Falling Star—known today as Nyanza.

Those were terrible days—those days when the Dawn of Time was still red in the horizon of Eternity. Those were the days when Outcast Gods, Dimo Giants, Viper Maidens, Life Eaters and Fire Leopards and many other monsters, vicious and horrible beyond description, still roamed a frightened earth.

But let us not delude ourselves into thinking that these horrible creatures no longer exist; they do. They take human shapes and cause evil in the lands of men. They disguise themselves as human beings and cause mighty wars in the lands of the tribes before vanishing once more into the 'Land-that-is-and-is-not'. They leave thousands of foolish human beings to kill each other. They can take over the bodies of people whom we know and commit vile crimes as them. These Evil Ones are with us yet.

Kahawa waited with growing impatience for the coming of his friend, his feet itching to take off into the mysterious forest. He longed to see the red blood of a hateful lion splatter the earth.

At last Mpushu appeared, unarmed and very scared-looking indeed. His thick-lipped fish-like mouth opened and closed like that of one just speared by a fisherman. Kahawa was amazed. He was disgusted and annoyed when his fat friend suddenly gasped: "My lord, we must not go and hunt this lion today."

For a few moments Kahawa was too angry to speak. His one great wish was to send Mpushu flying to the ground with a blow from his fist. But with great effort he controlled himself, fighting down the savage rage—the fumes of which clouded his brain and dimmed his vision with a red haze. When he found his voice at last he said, coldly and in measured tones: "I have always suspected you are a coward, Oh Mpushu, and now I am sure!"

Mpushu's eyes bulged and his ebony black face grew blacker. He swallowed noisily once and then said hoarsely: "You know that I am no coward, Oh Kahawa . . . you know it!"

"If you are not a coward then go and get your weapons and let us proceed," said Kahawa, still in the same cold voice.

A few moments later the two friends made their silent way down the hillside towards the brooding forest. Kahawa was thirsting for the blood of the old lion. His brain was already alive with pictures of himself standing triumphant over the old beast slowly dying at his feet.

But Mpushu was quaking with fear—fear from no earthly cause.

* * * * *

It was well past midday when the two friends, who had not spoken a single word to each other since leaving the settlement, came at last upon the trail of the lame old lion Kahawa had sworn to kill. They followed the trail from where the lion had eaten Kahawa's stepfather to where he had lain for the night. They followed the trail thence to where he had brought down a young impala which he had only partly eaten. They followed the trail from the carcass to where the old beast himself lay peacefully under an overhanging rock not far from the northern shore of the great 'Lake of the star that fell'.

It was Mpushu who first saw the lion lying there, the many battle scars on his tawny hide plainly visible. His eyes were still shining with that fire of greatness and unconquerable courage that one finds in all these noble beasts. Lonely, mateless and weak with age, this lion was still as regal as he had been in his younger days. A chief dethroned in some savage woodland battle, yea, but a chieftain nevertheless.

"Your lion, my lord," whispered Mpushu.

A gleam of demon-like delight burst upon the cold eyes of Kahawa. He raised his long spear with the needle-sharp point of bone and covered himself with his knee-length shield of elephant hide. Slowly he approached the lion with Mpushu close behind him.

He was about ten paces away from it when the beast turned his head and swept both his would-be attackers with his burning golden stare. He watched them as they came through the long grass, quietly, almost contemptuously, and he did not even move a muscle. His teeth bared and his eyes narrowed as Kahawa ventured another step or two. But for the rest he just lay there, calmly watching the hunters.

Suddenly Kahawa felt his fierce courage deserting him. Suddenly he was not a warrior thirsting for blood but a puzzled young boy facing a situation he could not understand. Lowering his spear he turned and looked at his friend—just in time to see Mpushu also lowering his spear, which he had held poised a thumb's length above Kahawa's kidneys.

"You treacherous jackal! You were trying to stab me from behind! Are you mad?"

"No, my prince. I had made it my unpleasant duty to kill you in order to stop you from killing this lion."

"What are you talking about, Mpushu?" asked Kahawa in blank amazement. "You . . . my friend . . . would have killed me . . . and you yourself suggested it."

"I would not have allowed you to take another step closer to the lion, my lord. You see, that lion is set there as a trap by the gods. If you kill that beast the Wakambi will be exposed to total annihilation."

Kahawa's face was a mask of sheer astonishment and open-mouthed surprise. He stared at his friend for a few moments as if doubting his sanity. Then he said: "You are talking gibberish like a drunken monkey, Oh Mpushu; I beg you to make yourself clear."

"After I left you last night, Oh Eagle of Marimba," said Mpushu in his customary respectful tone of voice, "I went straight into the soft valleys of slumber. Then I had a dream such as I have never had before in all my life. I dreamt that you and I went into the forest to hunt this lion you see lying there. The dream was so clear that even now I am still amazed at its clarity and accuracy. In my dream we came upon the lion exactly as you see him here, and that clump of herbs between his paws was there, in clear detail. I saw you stab the lion, and just as you withdrew your spear the lion changed into the princess Marimba, your mother, and she screamed at you while lying there, blood pouring from her mouth.

"I woke up with a start, but a few moments later I must have drifted off to sleep again. I dreamt the same dream over again—exactly the same, in every detail. Early this morning I went to see that toothless crone Namuwiza, the priestess, who told me that she too had a dream similar to mine, only longer and more detailed. She said I must prevent you at all costs from killing the lion, because if you did the whole Wakambi settlement would be wiped out this very night by a race of men who never smile, a race of men from the north. Both you and I would be slain and your immortal mother would be carried away."

For a long time after Mpushu had finished talking, Kahawa still stared at him like a man in a deep trance. Then, dropping his weapons, the son of Marimba approached the old lion and stood looking down at him. The old lion stared indifferently up at the human youth. There were tears in Kahawa's eyes as he turned to his friend and said, almost harshly: "Come, let us go."

Simba the lion watched the two humans turn and go, watched them until the forest swallowed them and they vanished forever from his sight. Disinterestedly, he wondered just what they had come to do to him and why they left without doing it.

Simba the lion was overcome by a great weakness; he wanted to stay just where he was, come what may. He was aware of a deep sense of contentment and peace, and a pleasant weakness was slowly creeping through the valleys of his brain like heavy, soothing mist. He slowly lowered his shaggy head between his great front paws as the gathering mists in his mind made his head feel very heavy.

Softly he closed his eyes. He never opened them again.

* * * * *

Mpushu and his subdued, strangely silent friend Kahawa were still some distance from the hilltop settlement that was their home when the son of Marimba said to the older youth quietly: "Mpushu, do not look behind you now. Neither must you show any signs of fear or excitement—but we are being followed by a strange man and he is not far behind."

"Is . . . is he one of the Evil Ones . . . a Life Eater maybe?" stammered Mpushu, his teeth chattering with fear.

"I know not, Mpushu, but this much I am sure of—he is following us to find out where we stay, and at all costs we must not let him discover the settlement!"

"What . . . what are we going to do?"

"We must ambush him, kill or capture him," said Kahawa coldly. "I saw his face through the corner of my eye as he looked over a bush some time back, Oh Mpushu, and I know he is not one of our people. His hair, for one thing, is of a strange hair-style, with a bundle above his forehead."

"Where can he have come from?"

"I do not know, but I think we have been wrong in thinking that we, the Wakambi, are the only human beings in this land. There is another race of men we have not realised existed, and that man following us is a member of this race."

"And this means that . . ." gasped Mpushu.

"This means that our first duty now is to reach the settlement and alert the people. But first we must dispose of that man behind us. Now this is what we must do . . ."

* * * * *

The stranger was tall and lean, and there was an inbred viciousness about him that made Marimba sick with fear. Although he was now unarmed and bound securely hand and foot with strong thongs of kudu skin, he still looked dangerous and the Wakambi warriors standing around him seemed to worry him not in the least. In fact, he looked up at them as if they were just so much useless vermin.

Mpushu and Kahawa had carried the tall stranger between them for a long distance after knocking him unconscious with a stone when he blundered upon their ambush. They had brought him to the base of the hill of the settlement and shouted to the guards to help them with their captive. They had tied him securely and brought him to Marimba, who was trying her best to interrogate him, without any response.

"We mean you no harm," she was saying; "we only want to know who you are . . . and from where you come."

"Humph," grunted the stranger.

"I know you are not a Life Eater or a Night Howler," pleaded Marimba. "You are a new race of man we never knew existed. Tell me, to what race do you belong and where are the rest of your people?"

"Huh," growled the stranger.

"This creature will not answer your questions, Oh Marimba," cackled the toothless witch Namuwiza. "But I know why he was following the two young men. He is a scout for a large force of other creatures like him which is even now a quarter of a day's journey from here . . . and coming fast."

"How do you know this, Oh honourable wise woman Namuwiza?" asked the princess, turning her beautiful, troubled face to look at the scrawny hag.

The old woman cackled a weird witch-laugh: "Little Namuwiza dreamt it all last night, all by her sweet self . . ."

"To me, all warriors!" cried Kahawa fiercely. "All available spearmen to me! They must not catch us unprepared . . . whoever they are. All warriors to my side—recall all hunting parties from the forest. Bring out every spear, every axe in the village . . ."

The people hurried into action, inspired by their fierce leader Kahawa. Great bundles of bone-tipped spears and harpoons were brought out while blasts from horn bugles recalled the hunting parties from the forest. Men ran hither and thither spreading the word throughout the great settlement.

Oblivious to the burst of activity around her, the princess Marimba was kneeling down beside the trussed-up stranger, studying him with great interest and curiosity, not unmixed with fear and admiration. The stranger was a man such as she had never seen before—handsome and yet very evil looking: one who could, she imagined, kill thousands of fellow men without the slightest pang of pity or remorse. She saw his long narrow face with its high forehead and square jaw. She saw his thin-lipped cruel mouth with its hard wrinkles at the corners. She saw his strange-looking long nose and deepset hard eyes, from whose depths gleamed the fire of resentment. She saw the strange hair-style—the thick bundle of plaited hair gathered above the forehead and tied firmly with a fine skin cord that went around the head to another bigger bundle jutting out like a woman's breast at the back of his head. She saw how his ears were pierced above and below, with heavy copper ear-rings that weighed them down. She saw ten necklaces made from the bones of human fingers and claws of lions and leopards adorning his neck. Lastly she saw his long spear lying some distance away where Mpushu had thrown it, with the other strange weapons the stranger carried.

This spear was not bone-tipped like those of the Wakambi. It was tipped with a heavy shard of ligwadla rock, and the princess noted with great relief that the spear, though formidable looking and heavy, was inferior to the bone-tipped Wakambi lances, because the latter could be sharpened, while when the more fragile stone point became broken the whole head had to be replaced.

But the other weapon filled Marimba with fear. It seemed that the stranger relied mostly on this weapon. It was a great bow with a well greased string and a heavy quiver full of stone-tipped arrows.

The bow was unknown to the Wakambi and many warriors were standing around and looking down at it in obvious puzzlement and dismay. It was clearly a deadly weapon and the Wakambi had no answer to it.

It was Mpushu who found the secret of opening the stranger's tight-lipped mouth after all else had failed. He merely strode up to the prisoner and said in cold disgust: "Whatever race spawned a miserable coward like this one is indeed very unlucky. Just look at him lying there; he is almost wetting his loinskin with fear and yet he tries to look brave!"

The stranger's eyes narrowed with anger and his gleaming teeth were bared in savage rage. His voice, heavy with a foreign accent, was barely a whisper as he said in clear though halting Si-Wakambi: "What did you call me?"

Mpushu whistled jubilantly. "So the beast can talk, can it? It is not dumb after all! I called you a coward, Oh vermin, and that you most certainly are."

"Untie my hands and feet, then we can talk further . . ."

"Untie your limbs?" exclaimed Mpushu in mock surprise, to drag out more conversation. "But we have only just caught you."

"You miserable fat idiot!" bellowed the stranger. "I'll tear you limb from limb as soon as I am free of these bonds."

"No loinskin-wetting foreign coward is ever going to tear me apart," said Mpushu happily. "And especially not a starveling like you."

"I am no starveling," roared the stranger. "You are speaking to a Masai, you bloated dog!"

"You are what?" asked Mpushu, highly amused, "a Makai? What is a Makai? From what slime-pit does a Makai crawl? It sounds like some kind of carrion worm."

"I said I am a Masai!" bellowed the captive. "And soon you will be cracking your stupid jokes in the land of the dead. The armies of my father, Fesi the Wolf, are very close at hand. You will all be dead by midnight."

"But what have we done that you wish to make war on us?" asked Marimba softly, now that the prisoner's tongue was thoroughly loosened.

"The Masai need no reason for making war," sneered the captive. "They fight whom they please, whenever and wherever they feel like it."

"But you are human like us, and you cannot kill people for no reason," protested the beautiful woman.

"The Masai are more than human. They are invincible and their might in war is beyond all human might," boasted the prisoner. "The Masai are gods and 'tis you who are low-down human vermin."

"Oh!" breathed Marimba. Her breasts heaved and a rare flash of anger brightened her large eyes briefly.

"The Masai are the 'Great People', the true lords of Creation. To us, war and killing are the very breath of life, more pleasant than a woman's kiss, and more heady than marula beer."

"For a captive in enemy hands you have far too big a mouth," said Kahawa coldly. "I am strongly tempted to take a deep breath of your life, if you find such an experience so recommendable."

"A Masai welcomes death at any time it chooses to come, and in whatever guise it comes. So your childish threat is wasted on me."

"You persistently praise your race," said Mpushu brutally. "But we are far from impressed. To us you sound like a zombie repeating words that some wizard has taught you. You are a poor example of the human race."

"My soul, my body, my life, my whole being belongs to Nangai of the Mountains," said the man in a terribly inhuman tone. "Nangai commands, I obey. Nangai is everything, I am nothing."

"Who is Nangai?" asked Marimba.

"Nangai is the One who Is. Nangai is the One who commands and is heard."

The little witch Namuwiza cackled weirdly. "These poor Masai are a race under the cruel spell of an outcast god who lives in the forests of Killima-Njaro. Little Namuwiza knows it all . . . Te-he-he-he . . ."

* * * * *

The hunting parties had all returned safely and the great gate was securely shut. The Wakambi were in tense readiness as they scanned the forests below for the first sign of the oncoming enemy. Night was falling fast and the land was once more shrouded in mystery.

On the high palisades warriors stood to arms—hard-eyed and tense in every muscle—waiting for the Masai to come storming up the slopes of the ancient hill on which the First Village stood. As the night crept across the land with its sombre mantle, people became touchy and easily irritated, but they remained hard of eye and grim of face. The First Village ever built in the land was under the shadow of suspense and was firmly gripped in the cruel claws of the vulture of fear. Then the people heard a strange sound: a sound that was not of this world, that flowed through the silent dusk like a silver river through dark forests.

It was a sound such as no human ears have ever heard before. It penetrated the very depths of the soul like cool water down a thirsty throat—like oil, soothing oil killing a cruel pain. Men stared at each other with incredulous wonder. Others groaned, and wept, blatantly and without shame.

It was a sound of unearthly beauty, and to the surprise of everybody it came from the throat of Marimba!

She had taken the deadly bow of the captive Masai and had fitted a gourd to the middle of the bow itself, transforming the deadly weapon of war thus into the first makweyana bow-harp the world had ever seen. Not only had

Marimba invented the first musical instrument, but she was singing the world's first song as well:

O, little star so far above—
Oh, smiling moon up yonder;
You who on these fruitful vales
Shed, aye, your heatless light.

Carry my song on the wings of your light—
Bear my refrains to the ends of the world;
Carry my voice to the Land of the Gods
Beyond the plains of Tura-ya-Moya.

Tell the Great Ones that live there forever—
Tell those that rule all the stars up above—
Tell the mother of all the seas and the earth
Beyond the plains of Tura-ya-Moya:

Tell them that though the hyænas of death
Prowl without my kraal tonight—
Tell them that all these perils I'll face
And that I'll never cringe nor cower.

Tell them that I, their humble servant maid,
Shrink not from the scowl of a foe—
For they who have the Great God as ally
Are twice the victors in war!

Tell them their servant implores them
For strength and their guidance true;
Mad is he who through Life's swamplands goes Without the guides from Tura-ya-Moya!

The Wakambi gathered in awe around their princess, their eyes wide open like so many astonished children. They had never heard a human being sing before. Never before had they heard sounds like those that streamed forth from the bow-harp as the princess gracefully struck the string with a short length of cane. They joined her as the magic of the song overwhelmed them, and soon the whole settlement was singing.

Their voices, most discordant from lack of experience, rang out across the startled heavens and the sleeping forests echoed and re-echoed to the heavenly strains of Tura-ya-Moya.

And the vast Masai armies advancing through the forests upon the Wakambi settlement paused in bewildered confusion as that unearthly melody reached their ears faintly across the dark distance.

"Nangai of the Mountains, save us!"

Like a deadly flower growing in a meadow of green grass, another strange idea was born in the brain of the princess Marimba as she sang. This idea had nothing to do with music; it had a lot to do with death—soon to be meted out to the advancing Masai!

She promptly ordered her warriors to cut broad, long strips of strong kudu hide while she organised the women into gathering piles of round stones in strategic positions behind the palisades. This done, the princess called her commanders together and explained to them the use of the slings of hide with the stone shot. The men listened in blank amazement as the incredible woman explained the use of this simple and yet deadly weapon that she had just invented.

* * * * * *

The night was as dark as the face of death. A mighty storm was building up its wrath in the east and into the ears of Kahawa came muted peals of savage thunder and he also saw the distant flickers of searing lightning. Kahawa was alone; he was one of the many guards posted all along the narrow walk inside the great stockade to give the alarm should the Masai risk a night attack. He was excited and his pounding heart beat faster than usual. This was war. This was no stupid conflict between mere clans over a mere trifle. This was the real thing: war in its deadliest form, a war between two different races of men!

Never since the very dawn of time had the land seen anything like it—two different races locked in a battle to death.

Kahawa was impatient; he wanted the Masai to come quickly so that the battle might begin sooner. He wanted to see the effectiveness of the weapons used by either tribe and especially the effectiveness of his mother's latest invention. Its effect should be devastating indeed!

A soft footfall induced him to whirl around, his heavy war club firmly gripped in his hand. But he gave a sigh of relief when a well-known and beloved voice said softly through the darkness: "Kahawa?"

"Mother!" whispered Kahawa fiercely, "what are you doing here?"

"I, too, am a warrior, Kahawa," came the rich voice from the darkness. "My son must not think that he is the only one who knows no fear. His mother is fearless too."

The dark shape that was Marimba moved closer to her son and a far-off flash of lightning was reflected briefly from the copper ornaments she wore. Kahawa felt a strong urge to tell his beloved parent to stop being foolish and to retire to her hut. Kahawa loved no one on earth more than he loved his mother and it did not matter if the whole Wakambi nation were wiped out, as long as his mother was safe. It was understandable therefore that his mother's next words filled him with an insane rage and an unquenchable hatred of the Masai.

"Kahawa, I wonder whether it would not be wise for me to surrender myself to the Masai when they come. It might stop them from attacking the village, and stop a needless war."

"Mother! What in the name . . ."

"Listen child, that Masai you captured has been talking to us again.

He told us the Masai have known for a long time that we were here. They have known about us for many generations but have simply chosen to leave us alone and continue fighting amongst themselves as they had always done. But some while ago their evil outcast god Nangai, who has enslaved the very souls of the Masai, ordered them to attack us and, after wiping our tribe out, bring me back to him alive."

"Bring you to him!" cried Kahawa furiously. "And what does he want to do with you?"

It seems that when Nangai was driven out of the land of the gods he was wounded grievously by an arrow of Mulungu, the Father of Light, and he has been bleeding slowly out of existence ever since. His left arm has been almost completely eaten away by the poison from Mulungu's arrow and he is dying the slow death of an immortal god. In order to survive he needs the living flesh of another immortal, a human immortal, to consume raw. He must also drink a little of that immortal's blood every day. And I happen to be the only immortal within reach."

"Ayieeee!" cried Kahawa in utter disgust. "You must not think of surrendering yourself to that foul monster, Oh my mother. I cannot bear to think of you being mutilated by that ogre!"

"My son, there is no other way. Nangai is dying fast and he is getting desperate. If he cannot get me one way he will the other, even if it means annihilating the entire Wakambi tribe. I cannot let this happen. I love the Wakambi people too much to be the cause of their destruction."

With that she turned to go and Kahawa felt like a man who had been stabbed to the heart. His mother was his very life and she was the only person for whom he had any love. He did not relish the prospect of losing his only surviving parent. Come what may, he was not going to allow his mother to surrender herself to Nangai.

He leapt after the departing silhouette and struck her a stunning blow on the back of her head with his war club. Using two of the five battle slings he had with him, he tied the heavenly form of his unconscious parent securely hand and foot. He then carried her to a small cave near the summit of the hill and gently laid her down within, rolling a great boulder over the mouth of the cave.

As he turned away from the cave the Masai launched the long-awaited attack. It was as sudden as it was ferocious. One moment the settlement had been wrapped in silence, with the distant growls of the oncoming storm the only sounds heard; the next moment alarm horns were sounding all along the stockade as keen-eyed night guardsmen saw shadowy figures creeping up the boulder-strewn slopes towards the village.

Wakambi warriors burst out of their huts and raced for the stockades as a withering storm of Masai arrows fell upon the village. Men and women caught in the open screamed hideously as falling arrows tore into their bodies. But the palisades were manned by then and the Wakambi were fighting back fiercely. About five thousand battle slings snapped and a hail of humming stones decimated the first wave of attacking Masai warriors. The survivors dived back into cover, from where they directed a hurricane of arrows at the settlement.

Covered by the fire from the survivors of the first wave, a second Masai attack-wave erupted from the darkness, rushing against the palisades. Though another humming tornado of slingstones mowed into this wave, too. Men died horribly in the battle-torn night; they died as slingstones crashed through their skulls or thudded into their bodies. They fell screaming as stones, as large as fists and larger, shattered their arm bones and shins.

A group of Masai reached the stockade in one place and tried to climb it. A fierce hand-to-hand battle ensued. Spears of all descriptions were flourished—bone-tipped and stone-headed; heavy wooden clubs and maces with heads of stone or copper; axes with heads of bone or common granite—all these hacked, smashed and thrust pitilessly. Quite a few Wakambi found the massive jaws of hippopotami most useful, and amongst these was Mpushu the Cunning.

The battle raged till well past midnight while the storm crept nearer and nearer, adding its own senseless fury to the clamour of the fighting below.

Twice on that horrible night the son of Marimba hurled back single-handed groups of Masai climbing the stockade; he was wounded thrice in the fierce fighting.

The angry storm put an end to the battle. The wildly furious thunder crashed and boomed its anger at the struggling human creatures down below. Men were deafened and shocked by the loud peals of unearthly thunder. The ground shook and vibrated as the voice of the Thunder Demon tore through the very fibre of the earth and the rain-pregnant clouds seemed to burst into hideous flame as sheets of purplish-white lightning ripped them to shreds of billowing, whirling wool. Bolt after bolt of forked lightning split the heavens apart as an axe splits the head of a man. And then, with a flare of flame as bright as the midday sun and a crack that sent even the bravest of the brave cowering down like whimpering children, a bolt of lightning split a tall mopani tree from the crown to the very roots.

Rain had not yet started to fall, but the Masai broke away and fled. The Wakambi, too, ran like so many rabbits for the safety of their huts and caves. A roaring fire was started in the forest by the lightning that had struck the mopani tree and hungry flames leaped high with joy, like a Sunfish Maiden leaping and writhing at a kiss from her lover. Shrill screams were heard above the shattering anger of the storm as Masai, frightened out of their wits, ran through the burning forest to escape the deadly embrace of the flames. Many were caught by the grumbling wind-fanned fire and burnt to death, shrieking like insane women for their traitor god to save them.

Then hail came, as big as babies' fists, in a howling curtain to scourge the dazed earth with insane mercilessness.

The storm thundered for the best part of the midnight hour and the Wakambi cringed and cowered in the darkness of their huts and caves. But gradually the storm spent its passion and the midnight winds of heaven carried the angry clouds away. A silence deeper than the deepest wells fell upon the dazed land. It was an eerie silence that was as ugly as it was frightening; it was the silence of Death.

"Listen, Oh Kahawa," whispered the grizzled old witchdoctor Somojo. "Listen!"

"I hear nothing, Oh Somojo," whispered Kahawa.

"Yes, my prince, that is what I mean—the silence is unusual. And yet it is terribly familiar!"

"It is like the silence that precedes an attack by the Night Howlers," said Mpushu soberly.

"The Night Howlers only attack in early summer," argued Kahawa, "and now it is well into late summer."

The frightened men lapsed once more into silence and the Great Silence seemed to deepen. Kahawa found his thoughts drifting towards his mother. He found himself wondering how she was faring in the dark cave in which he had imprisoned her. Heedless of his cruel throbbing wounds, he rose and made for the door of the hut. He never passed through it.

The hut was torn apart as though it was a ball of cobwebs, showering the petrified men inside with grass and broken twigs. Kahawa looked up and found himself staring into the great redly luminous eyes of a creature of unbelievable proportions whose dark silhouette obstructed the stars now peering through the clouds—a nightmare creature which had grasped the big hut in its vulture-like talons and was slowly and gloatingly tearing it apart to get at the men inside.

For a few moments the brave son of Marimba was paralysed with fear. He stared with hypnotic fascination deep into the huge eyes of the Night Howler—eyes that blazed like glowing embers, veined with veins that glowed like red-hot copper. The burning split pupils were the size of warriors' shields.

Then Kahawa instinctively hurled his war club, landing it straight in one of the Night Howler's eyes. The eye shattered and the glowing fluid poured down to the ground while the huge monstrosity let out a howl that split the night in two. Other Night Howlers descended upon their wounded comrade and quickly devoured him.

Others were still raising havoc amongst the huts. Most people managed to flee in wild terror into the caves, but quite a number were caught in the open and these were being driven into one area. Stray ones were promptly gobbled down. Many a warrior who had fought like a thousand lions, defending his wife and children against the alien Masai only a while earlier, ran like a rabbit, wetting his loinskin all the way and screaming like a mad girl, while a bloody-jawed Night Howler played havoc with those same wives and children.

Only Mpushu and his badly wounded friend Kahawa had the courage to fight, urged by their initial stroke of success. Already between them they could account for six of the hideous hell-monsters. They had accidentally discovered that the Night-Howlers' eyes were most vulnerable and easy targets in the dark. And each time they succeeded in hitting the target the creature would cringe and fall and many others would settle upon it, giving the tribe a brief respite.

The newly invented slings turned out to be most formidable weapons and practice was making Kahawa and Mpushu quite expert in their aim.

The great settlement was already razed to the ground and all the people who could not reach the safety of the caves were concentrated by the Night

Howlers into one panic-stricken madly screaming mob, ready for an orgy of devouring. But they were waiting as though to commence on a particular command.

Mpushu and Kahawa knew they were fighting their last battle. Their arms were numb through handling the slings without pause and they knew it was now simply a matter of time before they too were overwhelmed. Finally, they decided they could do nothing about those already herded together and they made off to reach the safety of a cave. As Mpushu turned to flee, a strange manly voice halted him in blank astonishment:

"My friends, I am with you."

Kahawa, too, turned to look at their newly found friend and got the shock of his life. Running with them was the tall Masai whom they had captured earlier—Koma-Tembo.

This totally unexpected ally put new strength into the two young men and, standing together, the three of them took a heavy toll of the Night Howlers. They fought until a voice of no earthly origin rang out as though from the empty air above their heads:

"Lay down your weapons, oh mortals, and yield yourselves into my mercy. I am Nangai and when I command I am obeyed."

The three men dropped their slings to the blood-stained ground in paralysed amazement. They could vaguely discern a queer apparition in midair above them. They knew very well what Nangai wanted even before he spoke.

"Where is the immortal female Marimba?"

No one answered. Mpushu noticed that silence had once more claimed the village—or what was left of it. The Night Howlers were silently awaiting further instructions.

"I asked you a question, young mortal dog!"

"Marimba is my mother, Oh Nangai, and I have taken her to a place of safety. You, and even the Most Ultimate God will reach her only over my dead body!"

"Nangai is not here to bandy words with immature mortals and he does not appreciate childish sentiments. Bring forth the female Marimba!"

"The mighty god Nangai can go and relieve himself in a rat hole!"

"Wretched mortal, you obey my command this instant, or I shall pass further instructions to my beasts that howl in the night."

Kahawa knew the meaning of naked fear for the first time in his life. He knew that Nangai was serious and that gods, high or low, active or outcast never make idle threats. They are not burdened with a conscience like human beings, nor are they loaded with emotion. A god does not know the meaning of love or loyalty; these are human weaknesses. Only the Goddess Ma suffers from these weaknesses and we have inherited ours from her.

"You keep me waiting, miserable mortal. I give you ten more heartbeats!"

Mpushu began to weep. He tried to implore Nangai, but the god ignored him and addressed himself only to Kahawa. The Night Howlers looked appealingly at Nangai, waiting for the order to commence their delicious meal. Nangai ignored them just as he ignored Mpushu.

"Well, mortal, your time is up"

There was no reply from Kahawa. Through further moments of silence Kahawa's hand closed firmly around the hilt of his bone dagger and Mpushu saw a gleam of unearthly light in the eyes of his young friend. Then very calmly Kahawa measured his words: "My answer is still No, Oh Nangai!"

* * * * *

THE young prince Kahawa half-drew his bone dagger from its sheath. Into his eyes there came a look that Mpushu could not at first explain. It was the look that comes into the eyes of one who has just had a shattering inspiration, one who has suddenly found the answer to a problem that had been gnawing at the back of his mind with the persistence of a rat. Mpushu saw his friend direct a stare of unspeakable contempt at the god Nangai floating on his throne in empty air. Then the young Kahawa sneered right into the god's face, sneered as one sneers at a human enemy whom one holds beneath contempt.

Suddenly the eyes of the god blazed with cold, murderous fury. He realised that a dead Kahawa was more unlikely to speak than a live Kahawa. He made a snap signal to the nearest Night Howler, who promptly snatched up Kahawa and held him aloft in one vulture-like claw.

"Now, mortal, speak or you shall die!"

Kahawa began to laugh, a harsh, contemptuous and insulting laugh. The Night Howlers stared first at him and then at Nangai in great puzzlement and even the human beings huddled together looked at the son of Marimba in blank amazement.

"Under the sun that shines in the skies above," Kahawa said at last, "there is nothing more tragic, more pathetic, than a creature once great and powerful, still clinging with stubborn tenacity to the tattered shreds of his vanished power. There is nothing more tragic than the sight of this creature trying to deceive itself and others into thinking that it still holds the power it held in the past. You are such, Nangai, you are no longer a god. You are nothing but a slightly higher form of common demon. When Mulungu drove you from the golden valleys of Tura-ya-Moya like a wounded and beaten cur he also stripped you of your immortal powers. You use force, Nangai, you torture like a common human thug. You used to have powers with which, if you had retained them, you could have learnt the whereabouts of my mother by simply reading my mind. Using force is an admission of failure. You are a failure, a pathetic fetish that-once-was and the Masai are your dupes. You send them in force to attack the whole settlement when all you could have done was to render yourself invisible, enter our village unseen and carry my mother away. You had to have help—on a large scale at that—you wretched fallen fetish . . ."

"Silence, mortal dog! When I wish to hear your raving and idiotic prattling I'll ask for it! Where is your mother?"

"Find her yourself . . . use your godly powers . . ."

Nangai gave a brisk command to the Night Howler, who slowly started sinking his talons into the flesh of Kahawa.

It was just then that a miracle happened—a miracle in the form of a song that came floating through the night air like a ghost of pure mercy and deliverance. This song had a magic spell about it. It stunned the fiendish Night Howlers. There was a musical instrument in the singer's hands which in future years became known as the karimba or kalimba. This unearthly music sent a haunting melody through the night and wove a mighty spell around the squatting Night Howlers. It paralysed them—destroyed them.

They let out a mighty roar in unison and, as though they had all become victims of an alien virulent leprosy, their scaly flesh began to slough off their skeletons and to flow sluggishly down the slope of the clearing in the ruined village. Wisps of reeking steam erupted from their distended slime-green bellies as their foul bowels burst with sounds terrible to hear, and from these wisps floated the ghosts of the people they had already devoured.

These ghosts were happy—happy to escape and float away to the land of Forever-Night, there to await their reincarnation.

But first they joined in the song sung by the woman with the kalimba. They soared and dived and soared again. They danced and weaved and leaped in the dark night air, and a regiment of them capsized the evil Nangai's throne and he fell like a lump of cow dung into the reeking, oozing slime that had been the flesh of the Night Howlers. All the people who had been herded together became caught in the webs of the Song of the Kalimba. They tore off their soiled loinskins, skirts and ornaments, flung them aside, and raised their arms in thanksgiving to the High Gods for their deliverance, after which they too joined in the sacred Song of the Kalimba.

Dead and living joined in and the very stars rejoiced. The gods wept crystal tears and bowed their heads in tribute and acclaim. Marimba led the hosts of dead and living with her song until the eastern sky greyed with the first promise of coming dawn.

Eventually she dropped her kalimba and ran to where her son was lying. She threw her arms around him and wept. She kissed his forehead and both his ears and, drawing him close to her soft breasts, she wept long and loud, tears not of sorrow but of pride and pure joy and unfathomable happiness. When she released him Kahawa did something which shocked his gentle parent and the rest of the Wakambi but which was to become a firm Law of the Tribes in generations to come. With an abandoned axe of sharpened stone he deliberately chopped off his own right hand.

With the bleeding stump raised high, he addressed the shocked Wakambi: "People of the Wakambi, with this gesture I am laying down a new law that you must accept with your hearts and souls, and make it part of your lives until the rending of the knot of Time. In order to prevent my parent from delivering herself to the evil Nangai, I had to strike her unconscious with a club before I could hide her. But the ends do not justify the means; I broke the very Law of the Stars by striking the sacred vessel that carried me for more than nine agonising moons. Let this be your law, your very siko, that anyone, male or female, who strikes his or her mother for any reason, shall forfeit his or her right hand—voluntary or otherwise. By this siko I beg my ancestors to cleanse me, and my children's children, of the foul taint of my sin, and I also beg the forgiveness of both Ma the Great Mother, and of the beautiful Marimba, who is my mother."

"My son, my dear child, did you have to do it?" Marimba caught her son as he sagged to the ground and everybody crowded around to assist with easing the agony of the brave prince. Kahawa smiled up at his mother and whispered: "Tell me mother, how did you manage to escape from the cave?"

"I did not, son; I was rescued by the witchwoman Namuwiza and her two sons just before the Night Howlers devoured them, and I spent some time making this instrument to help you . . ."

Kahawa heard no more as unconsciousness claimed him.

* * * * *

A great happiness settled over the land and the Wakambi prospered and multiplied, so they could afford to wrinkle their noses at the Masai in contempt and defiance. The Masai were forever freed of the evil spell of the traitor god Nangai, though they never lost their stiff-necked pride and their arrogance, which was like a disease.

Marimba invented many more songs: love songs, hunting songs and even songs to sing when a beloved one was interred. She invented the xylophone, which is still called the marimba to this day.

People sang and whistled and their souls were uplifted by the melodies and tunes their immortal queen had given them. For the first time since the escape of Odu and Amarava from the destroyed land of the First People, human beings held feasts and dances and came to know again the soothing joy that beautiful tunes bring to depressed and life-weary souls.

For a full ten years Marimba refused marriage. She sturdily resisted the powerful demands of her own bothersome body and endured the searing agony of lonely nights of weeping herself to sleep. She saw her son happily married to two Wakambi girls and prospering in general happiness. She saw more villages of Wakambi clans built to accommodate the spreading population. Soon the original settlement became the High Village of a small empire which she ruled with wisdom that only an immortal can possess.

'As the years wore on she found it more and more difficult to resist the ardent wooing of her greatest suitor, Koma-Tembo, the lion-hearted Masai whom Kahawa had captured and who had stood side by side with him against the evil god and the Night Howlers, so many years earlier.

Then one night that which was written in the stars and destined to happen, did happen! Lo, not even immortals are immune to fate.

* * * * *

The hut was dark. The hut was lonely. And in its dark interior on a pile of lion and leopard skin blankets reclined, in queenly solitude, one of the most beautiful women that ever trod this earth—Marimba the peerless, Marimba the Goddess of Music, the Goddess of Happiness.

There was a deep sadness in her long-lashed eyes and a crystal-clear tear stole unbidden down the side of her flat little nose. The battle is hardest when one has oneself for an enemy, and Marimba was her own enemy in many ways. Outside the hut there was merriment. Hundreds of Wakambi were feasting and dancing round a great fire in the village clearing. The happy night rang with their laughter and lusty singing. The appetising smell of boiling and roasting meat was heavy in the night air. But she who had brought the happiness to her people was no partaker of it that night.

A dark shadow crawled into the hut through the low arched entrance and the immortal heart of Marimba stopped beating for a few misty moments. Well she knew who it was who had just slipped into the hut. It was the man whom she loved with all her immortality—a man she desired with every vein and artery in her hungry body. But she dared not accept him for fear of sealing his doom.

The reddish-yellow light of the distant feast fires played on one side of his manly face. It accentuated the deepset smouldering eyes and it made the hard lines about his imperious mouth and strong nose appear more harsh.

Koma-Tembo the Masai was, even though seated and at peace, a man born and bred to love, to command and to fight. Marimba watched him through misted eyes as he sat there near the door of the hut and longed for him as an impala longs for the cool waters of a woodland stream. Yet she was praying to the One Thousand Gods that the man should keep his distance and not come any nearer than he was. Well did the deathless woman know that should the great Masai come any closer her fiery emotions would betray her—and him!

"I see you, Oh Koma-Tembo," she said with a great effort.

"And Koma-Tembo sees the bright sun of his life," was his measured reply.

"Koma-Tembo basks in the sun that scorches," she said, forcing a smile. "There are suns in whose light it is not wise to sit."

"I mind not being scorched by the sun that is the incomparable Marimba," he said with a smile. "Neither do I mind being drowned by the pure river that is she."

"Marimba has told the woodheaded Masai many times why she cannot accept him as a husband," said Marimba. "And yet Koma-Tembo is as stubborn as a frog that refuses to be driven out of the hut with a broom."

"From the incomparable Marimba, Koma-Tembo will never take No for an answer."

Suddenly the princess lost her temper and even as the angry words poured from her mouth, her desire for this son of the Dragon of the Waters grew until it seemed like a mighty wave of burning lava from the fiery belly of Killima-Njaro. "You are a fool, Koma-Tembo! You men are all stupid, stubborn fools! Your lust pulls you by the nose right into the valleys of undoing. You will never leave things well alone. I have told you a hundred times that I cannot accept you as my man, because you would be dead within three moons of our marriage. I am trying to save your life, you porridge-brained fool! You must now leave this hut immediately."

"Before I leave your presence, Oh sun of my life, I must first hear you say you love me."

This was too much for the tormented woman. Tears welled out of her eyes, wetting her face, and deep sobs shook her beautiful form. She turned and shrieked at the Masai: "You know that I love you—you have known for two years. You only keep on asking because you like to torture me. Now get out of this hut quickly . . . hamba! simbira! You . . . you mulita-busiko . . . Night Howler!"

Koma-Tembo was astonished. His mouth hung open in a most un-Masai fashion. He had not known that his queen had been in love with him for two years already, and that she was held back from marrying him only by the curse on her head. Like all Masai, Koma-Tembo had little use for life—be it his own or anyone else's—and it was more pleasant for him to spend three moons with Marimba in love and happiness than a whole lifetime of suffering and loneliness. And as he advanced those few paces that separated him from the object of his love, Koma-Tembo knew very well that he had exactly three moons to live—but he also knew that each day of it would be worth more than a thousand lifetimes.

As he took his beloved gently into his battle-scarred arms, he told her so.

Marimba was shocked to feel the hands of the Masai on her. She shuddered and let out a small gasp of fear. Feebly she tried to push him away. But her arms, instead of thrusting, tightened about his neck and drew him closer, while her body strained savagely against him. Her willpower shattered against the rocks of desire and went flying into a million shards of rainbow-coloured crystal. What deadlier betrayer is there than one's own body? What fouler enemy had the human being than the desire that flows in the blood of his own veins? Marimba was lost.

* * * * *

Later—much later that night Marimba went out into the village clearing to join in the all-night feasting and dancing round the great fires. Never before had her people seen her more lively, more active and vivacious. She was the very fount of song and hilarity, and she danced like an uninhibited tempest ravaging a country.

But Kahawa was not deceived by his mother's cheerfulness. He saw through it clearly as through a crystal-clear drop of water. He had seen the tall Masai enter his mother's hut and he guessed the decision she made even before she announced it to the cheering people.

Marimba had decided to marry again after more than ten years—and she was going to suffer the agony of bereavement once again. All her cheerfulness, all her vivacity, was an attempt at shutting out of her mind this unpleasant fact.

* * * * *

It was a year-and-a-half later and the beautiful queen of the Wakambi was alone in the dark forest. She sat on the bank of the same river which, so many years ago, had seen her second husband attacked and devoured by an old lion. That same river had seen the death of Koma-Tembo, the valiant Masai, whom she had loved as she had never loved any other man before.

Koma-Tembo had gone out with about fifty hunters and snare diggers to trap a rhinoceros that had taken up residence near the river and had developed the habit of charging groups of women who came from the village to fetch water. As usual, Koma-Tembo had volunteered to take the most risky duty of all; this time he had chosen to be the decoy man. In this capacity he had to lure the beast towards the circle of great pits cleverly covered with poles and grass. Once inside the circle, the animal was provoked to blind fury by a shower of stones and sticks hurled by the other hunters who were hiding in the undergrowth. As decoy, Koma-Tembo had to expose himself at this stage and invite the beast to charge him. He would then lead the beast to one of the pits whose cover was strong enough to carry the weight of a human being, but not that of a heavy beast.

Koma-Tembo had successfully decoyed the furious rhinoceros right into one of the great snare-pits, but he had tripped and fallen into it himself. The Masai and the rhinoceros had met the same fate at the points of the deadly stakes planted in the bottom of the pit.

Marimba was disconsolate. She had taken to the habit of going alone into the forest merely to sit in a secluded spot and meditate—with her songs as her only company. But the people she ruled noticed that the more their queen suffered at the hands of the gods the more beautiful became the songs she composed and sang, and the more fantastic the musical instruments she invented.

She invented six different kinds of reed flutes, and pipes.

She was sitting alone near the river when Kahawa, now known as 'The Left-handed', came along the river bank at a run and in obvious excitement—a rare thing with him indeed!

"I am here, Oh Kahawa. I am over here."

Kahawa came striding through the undergrowth. He was fully armed and he wore the usual hard expression on his face. But his brow was, in addition, clouded by a great puzzlement which surprised Marimba very much.

"What is the matter, Oh Kahawa?" she asked as she rose to her feet. "What has happened, my child?"

"Come with me, Oh mother," said Kahawa with barely concealed excitement. "Come with me, for I have to show you yet the strangest sight of your life."

Marimba followed her son through the dark scowling forest. She followed him through glades where the breeze whispered in the tall grass and through swamps where otters played amongst the reeds, and swamp birds nested in the tall lubaga.

They went eastward towards the distant mountains and soon Marimba found herself paving a way up the boulder-strewn slopes while the ground fell gradually behind her. A cruel shrub armed with vicious dry thorns scratched her smooth immortal thigh, drawing blood of heavenly purity. She let out a small cry of pain and Kahawa whirled, his stone-headed mace gripped tightly and at the ready. Then he saw the scratch and the blood and a strange intense feeling he could not identify swept through the valleys of his soul.

"Maie agwe!" he cried; "you are hurt, mother!"

"It is nothing, Oh my son. It is nothing but a scratch from a thorn-bush."

"Sit down and rest, mother."

"I am not tired, my child; we can still go on."

"Mother, sit down," commanded Kahawa fiercely.

"You are a true son of your father," said the surprised woman with a weak smile as she sat down on a boulder. "But you must not use force all the time, son; force destroys him who uses it."

"Mother, force is good when used to defend or protect things that one holds dear, and to defend you I am prepared to use all the force in the world."

"My son, you must never concentrate all your love on one thing or one person. You must learn to extend your love to the world in general, because you are part of it and the world is part of you."

"I hear you, Oh mother," said Kahawa softly.

"And above all, you must try and be a good husband to the two girls I gave you for wives, my son. They are always complaining that you come home with a terrible temper—you refuse to touch them and criticise the food they cook for you."

"But mother," protested Kahawa, "I did not want to get married in the first place. I have no time for women. Besides, those two you gave me are the worst you could find. The first one, Lozana, is a frightened bore who chatters like a jungle monkey from dawn to dusk without pause, and the second, Lukiko, is a fat stupid idiot who not only reminds one of a lost buffalo stuck in the mud, but smells like one too, and has the brains of one . . ."

"My son!" cried the mother. "What words are these? What horrible things are these that you are talking? It is your duty to beget children to carry your father's name on to generations to come and your personal feelings must never interfere with that duty. Whether you love your wives or not is beside the point. Now, Kahawa, I want to see either or both your wives pregnant in two months' time . . . and I shall tolerate no further back-talk from you!"

"Oh mother, I have far better things to do in life than begetting noisy bawling babies."

Marimba was about to make a heated reply when she was interrupted by the sudden appearance from behind a boulder of Kahawa's friend, Mpushu the Cunning. Mpushu was sweating profusely from his hard climb up the hill. He threw himself on his knees and crossed his arms in front of his fat face in salutation to Marimba. Then he lifted his fish-like face and said to Kahawa: "I have been down to the strange beasts, oh Eagle of Marimba, and I have found out something that is a great surprise. The beasts are not only harmless but they are so docile that you can actually pull the ears of some of the females and they will follow you."

"What strange beasts are you talking about, Oh Mpushu?" asked the puzzled Marimba.

"Come with me, Oh Mother; come and see," Kahawa urged.

Puzzled, Marimba followed her son and his friend farther into the rocky hills of the north-east. They climbed over a hill and halfway down the other side they stopped. "Look, mother, look down there in the valley."

Marimba followed her son's pointing arm and her eyes met the strangest sight she had ever seen. The valley below was full of the strangest animals. These animals were like buffalo but a shade smaller and, unlike the buffaloes which are all the same colour, these animals ranged in colour from black to dark brown, from red to white. Many of them were either brown-and-white, black-and-white, or had brown bodies and white bellies. All had horns that were totally unlike anything Marimba had seen before.

"What are they, my son?"

"I do not know for sure, mother, but from what I gathered from the survivors of the people who brought them here, they are known as tame animals, mother."

"Tame animals? They look dangerous enough to me."

"They are quite docile, mother, and there is something about them one does not find amongst wild beasts."

"How did you find them, my son?"

"Mpushu and I had been out on a hunt, mother. We saw these strange animals from where we are standing now. At first we thought they were a kind of antelope and we decided to hunt them. But, strangely, they did not run when they saw us, neither did they charge us as buffaloes would. Then Mpushu noticed that there were people with the strange creatures and we went down to investigate. We found that all but one of these people were lying in the tall grass and dying of some sort of epidemic. We saw that there were ten men and three women, and all the men were either dead or dying fast, and that of the women, one was still alive. And she does not seem to be suffering from the malady at all."

"Whence come these people, my son?"

"I do not know, mother. The surviving woman is too frightened of us to talk clearly. But when she does talk, it is a pleasure to listen."

* * * * *

The surviving woman was hardly more than a girl, a pretty little thing with rather prominent front teeth, and with a skin that was as black as pure ebony. She wore her hair plaited into numerous tiny plaits that hung down her forehead and down her back. She wore an ankle-length skirt of leopard skin and a necklace of strange shining beads and sea shells. Broad bracelets of bronze blazed upon her arms and forearms. She looked up as Marimba came and stood facing her. Under the curious gaze of the immortal woman the strange girl lowered her eyes selfconsciously.

"Tell me, child," said Marimba at last, "where do you come from?"

It took some time for the strange girl to answer. "From Nuba . . . we come . . ."

"Where is Nuba?"

"Away—far, far, far."

"What are those animals you have brought with you?"

"Meat animals—we eat. Also milk—we drink."

"You eat the meat of those animals, and drink their milk?"

"So—so we do."

Then Kahawa asked the girl what had killed those people with whom she had been. In her strange halting way she explained that her father and his servants, and her mother, had eaten mushrooms cooked and served by the other female servant, who had also eaten some. The girl had been saved by the fact that at the time of the eating she had been suffering from a bad headache and had no appetite at all.

Marimba asked the girl what her father had been doing so far away from his native land. Her answer shocked Kahawa and brought tears into the eyes of Marimba. The girl said it was a belief among their people that if one travelled southward long enough one will eventually reach the Land of Peace. Her father had been a priest in their native land and a firm believer in this myth. He had taken all his wealth and wife, daughter and servants and had set out southwards in search of the Land of Peace.

Abruptly the little stranger girl threw herself into the arms of Marimba and begged for protection, as she now had no parents. It was customary in their land for orphans to be adopted, even by complete strangers, and would Marimba please adopt her and protect her? As for the cattle, would Marimba please take them?

As Kahawa and Mpushu rounded up the two thousand beasts and drove them towards the High Village of the Wakambi, Marimba asked the girl what her name was and the girl answered: "Rarati . . . it is this one . . . my name . . . respected Ma-Rimba."

"Rarati," said the princess Marimba, "your name shall never be forgotten. Future generations shall hail you as the one who brought the secret of cattle-keeping into the Land of the Tribes. I greet you, Oh Rarati, my daughter."

The beautiful queen of the Wakambi, the peerless Marimba, was walking through the forest with her handmaidens on her way to the riverside to bathe her body in the cool waters. Birds sang in the trees overhead and the forest was heavy with the scent of thousands of flowering shrubs. Myriads of butterflies and colourful insects were fluttering in clouds of white, blue and brown among the wild flowers and the buzzing song of nyoshi, the bee, was clearly heard in the blinding sunlight. Timid hares galloped through the long grass and the cooing voice of le-iba, the turtle dove, added yet more enchantment to an already enchanting day.

The sky was the purest of blue. Only a few clouds were to be seen in the eternal expanse of the heavens and these were as soft as wool and as delicate as the body of a Sun-maiden.

As the queen went through the forest, her great eyes were as alive as moon crystal. From the enchanting woodland scene she drank in inspiration as the grateful grass drinks the morning dew. Where the ordinary man sees only the trees, she saw them in their dignity and superb beauty; and where the ordinary man hears only the rustling of the breeze through the branches of the trees, and the senseless twittering of the numerous birds, she heard the soul-stirring verses of the Song of Creation.

She was not very far from the river when she saw a number of young boys gathered together above something that lay in the tall grass. The boys were talking and gesticulating excitedly and were all patting one amongst them on the back in obvious congratulation. Their voices floated through the scented air into the keen ears of Marimba and, as one might expect from this great woman, she left her retinue and went to investigate. What she saw there filled her with anger and disgust, and tears sprang unbidden into her eyes. One of these boys had invented a particularly vicious and cowardly kind of snare with which to catch young antelopes. He had tried it out and it had worked all too well. Lying on the ground with a cruel noose around her lifeless neck was a young steenbuck ewe which had fallen a victim of this fiendish trap, and the poor animal had only a few days to go before it produced young.

"Which of you sons of night-howling, splay-footed, green-bellied hyænas invented this thing?" demanded Marimba hotly.

The boys made no reply. They just stared at their dusty feet in very frightened silence. Two of them wetted their loinskins at the same time, much to the amusement of the royal handmaidens.

"I asked you a question, you mud-wallowing tadpoles!" cried Marimba.

At last one of them said in a voice that was hardly a whisper: "I . . . I did, Oh Great One."

"You did, did you?" cried Marimba in a burst of ecstatic fury. "Now indeed, you are going to suffer for your deed!"

"Mercy please, Oh Great One," whispered the boy.

"Marimba has no mercy for bloodthirsty little idiots of your kind," said the angry queen coldly. "Breathe into the nostrils of that animal and bring it back to life."

The astonished followers of Marimba saw the boy lift the head of the dead buck and actually try to breathe life back into it. There was a gale of feminine laughter which the angry chieftainess quelled with a look of cold fury in her glittering eyes. A deep respectful silence settled upon the group of watching maidservants while the boy, with sweating face and inflated cheeks, and a heart that was almost stopping with cold fear, huffed and puffed in vain to revive the dead animal.

"That animal had better come back to life, Oh little vermin," said the princess cruelly. "If it does not you will soon wish that you had never been born."

The badly frightened boy tried his best. He tried everything he could while the queen watched him coldly and impassively, and the handmaidens watched with broad smiles on their faces.

"Why," said Marimba at long last, "it seems to me as if you find it easier to kill an animal than to bring it back to life!"

"I cannot make it live again, Oh Great Queen," stammered the boy. "It still wants to remain dead."

"Then you must surrender yourself to punishment," said the queen ominously.

"Please do not kill me!" screamed the boy in utter terror. "I am still too young to die . . . I do not want to die!"

"The animal that you killed with the fruits of your evil brain did not want to die either," observed Marimba.

"Please . . ."

"Seize him!" cried the princess to her attendants. "Seize and hold fast the pestilential horror!"

The giggling girls fell upon the boy and held him fast. He struggled and kicked and bawled in vain. He yelled to his friends to save him. But those loyal friends had proved their loyalty by vanishing into the sheltering bush, leaving him to face the music alone. "Bring him to the village—I want to deal with him properly in the presence of all the people."

* * * * *

The gathered Wakambi were sitting in a great semicircle in the High Place of Justice at the very summit of the hill which was now known as the Hill of the Wakambi. The princess Marimba sat on her throne at the foot of an upright slab of rock that was known as the Rock of Justice. She was flanked on either side by two old men.

The old man on her left was known as the High Accuser and the one on her right was known as the Mercy of Heaven, and it was his duty to plead for mercy on the prisoner's behalf—but not to defend him from the accusation.

Marimba was the one empowered to execute the prisoner after he had been found guilty. The power to execute was granted to all those people who had seen the prisoner actually commit the offence for which he was charged.

Trials were held only at the 'rising of the moon' among the Wakambi and everybody was waiting in silence, where even a whisper was strictly forbidden, for the rising of the heavenly orb. Night had fallen and the land was swathed in the dark mantle of obscurity, and in the scowling forests below the Great Village lions were roaring their fury at the glittering stars, while leopards coughed defiance to all and sundry.

The boy, Malinge, who had been caught by Marimba in the act of wantonly destroying living things, knew that the coming of the moon would also mean the coming of his own death, and he was numb with fear. He turned round and looked in the direction of his parents seated with the other villagers near one of the great Fires of Justice that had been lit in a semicircle to illuminate the High Place of Justice. There were seven such fires, each representing the Seven Gates of Creation that separate this material world from the bright bronze plains and crystal forests of Tura-ya-Moya, where the gods have birth and where Lizuli, the whore of eternity, dances nightly before the thousand eyes of the Most Ultimate.

These fires were not kindled with wood, but with the leaves of the mpepo plant and were fed with the bones of that kind of animal against which the accused had committed the offence. When a man was charged with murder, human bones were fed into the fires. On this occasion the bones of antelope were fed into the fires.

Malinge cast a pleading glance at the face of the grim and bearded warrior that was his father and found no mercy and no recognition there. Nor did his own mother and other brothers seem to know him at all. He knew he was alone—and lost. Then, with that breath-taking majesty that fills the eyes with tears, the moon rose above the distant mountains.

As it rose, a wild scream of naked terror was torn from the lips of the wretched Malinge and he tried to bolt out of the Place of Justice. But Mpushu and Kahawa seized him and held him fast.

"Stand still and take your punishment like a man, Oh Malinge," said

Mpushu. "Do not try to cheat the lion of justice of his juicy prey. Nothing very serious is going to happen to you. You will only be deprived of your nose and ears and then thrown to very, very hungry crocodiles. Something worth looking forward to, eh?"

"Aiyeeee!" shrieked Malinge in appreciation.

"Malinge, the son of Katimbe, the son of Ngungu, the son of Lembe, here stands accused of having wantonly and wilfully destroyed a living thing for no other reason than to see the effect of the new kind of snare that he had invented." The voice of the High Accuser was harsh, a rasping croak. "He destroyed a little steenbuck ewe with young in its belly, and here you can see for yourself the sorry remains of his victim on the Tray of Accusation. This boy was not hungry when he committed this deed, neither had he the intention of taking the animal to his father to prepare for food. It was a clear case of wanton useless destruction of life, in direct defiance of the Laws of Odu. Malinge must die. He must die so that the Great Mother's displeasure at this demon-like act should be disarmed, so that the wrath of the High Gods be not showered upon us like evil hail. Malinge must die—not to deter others from committing the same offence, but that by dying he can take his heinous sin with him to the land of Forever-Night, away from the huts and villages of the Wakambi."

With this the High Accuser sat down, fiercely scowling at the villagers assembled before him. An even deeper silence settled heavily upon the High Place of Justice.

The other Old One, the Mercy of Heaven, then rose tottering to his ancient, withered feet. "People of the Wakambi: to you this unworthy one addresses this message. We all know that the young boy Malinge is guilty and we all know that he must suffer the most ultimate form of punishment, because if we let irresponsible young people kill the animals of the forest wastefully, it will not be long before the High Gods will deprive us of all living things on which we depend for food. It will not be long before the forests become only the haunts of starving jackals and hyænas with no other animals in sight, and we would all die the shameful death of hunger. So I, too, agree that this young man must be punished. But I plead that we give the boy the opportunity to explain to us in his own words just why he did this thing and why he felt prompted to break one of the oldest and most sacred laws of our people, and above all, why he dared to improve on our standard methods—why he rendered these more cruel as the very design of this trap shows."

His voice faltered and he sat down, wiping the sweat from his wrinkled brow with the back of his hand. There were tears on his wrinkled cheeks and his gentle tired eyes were inflamed and bloodshot.

"Stand up, prisoner," bellowed the High Accuser. "Stand up and tell us why you broke the laws of the gods, why you dared to improve upon the things that our ancestors invented. Do you consider yourself wiser than your forefathers?"

"N-no," stammered the boy, "I only thought . . ."

"Listen, Oh vermin, rasped the High Accuser, "this is not a world that belongs to you. If you want a world which you can improve then you can go and create one for yourself. In this world you will take your place as the insignificant speck that you are and you must conform to the rules as laid down by our forefathers. You must not try to improve on anything that they had found good enough. You seem to have forgotten that it was the love for inventing new things that caused the destruction of the First People. Don't tell me that you have never heard the Seven High Laws of Living, because I know that you have."

There is something known as hope, and that something has the habit of shining brightest when a man gets more hopelessly lost in the forest of fear and despair. Hope is a false star shining brightest on the darkest night of one's life. In the words of the High Accuser, the doomed boy Malinge saw a glimmering thread of hope and he seized it and held fast to it. A man about to die loses all fear. He throws all respect and dignity to the Seven Winds and says and does exactly as he pleases, and Malinge did exactly that.

"You doddering old hypocrites!" he screamed at the top of his squeaky voice. "You are not fit to sit in judgment over a lame and half-dead fly. You say I broke a law by inventing something new. Why then is our Queen Marimba not being accused of inventing all those new instruments with which she makes music?"

Malinge's hope of revenge on the woman who had brought him to trial was drowned in a flood of laughter that followed immediately on his impudent outburst. The assembly laughed long and loud till the High Accuser had to stand up and roar for silence.

"You utter fool!" he bellowed. "You miserable, impudent rat! Marimba is an immortal, an appointed servant of the gods on this earth, and what she does is done at the command of the most High Gods. Royal Marimba, pronounce sentence upon this mud-wallowing dog."

Marimba stood up and her great eyes were bright in the moonlight. There was also a great sadness in those eyes that was beyond human understanding. Her voice was soft and gentle as she said: "Malinge, I am not your executioner and I find myself unable to order your death. But I am not going to let you escape lightly. The High Gods tell me that you are a habitual and stubborn law-breaker, who acts thus for the sheer pleasure it gives you. It also gives you pleasure to see innocent animals die in agony. I now order that you be taken away from here and your legs broken with clubs so that you may never walk again, and your hands destroyed by paralysing your fingers."

Marimba looked down at the ugly snare that Malinge had invented and shuddered. There was no mistaking it—the thing was deadly and only a madman, a monster of cruelty, could have invented this sort of thing. No wonder the old men had overruled her and had thrown Malinge to the crocodiles just before daybreak.

Then Marimba got down on her knees and began to work. She dismantled the long trapdoor consisting of oblong flat pieces of wood tied together with buckskin thongs and gut. She made small alterations to the pieces of wood so that they were no longer of the same length and thickness. She ordered her handmaidens to bring her a number of cusana gourds of different sizes and to open each end, making a big hole in the one end and a small one in the side. Her next order was equally peculiar: the gourds were to be put in a large clay bowl at the gate of the village and word spread that all the old women of the village were to pass their morning water into the big bowl for three successive days. This, explained the great princess, was not only to place a permanent blessing upon the instrument; it would also make the gourds resilient and durable.

Afterwards the gourds were boiled in animal fat to make them more resilient and waterproof. With her own delicate hands Marimba assembled the instrument while vast crowds of Wakambi men and women watched in awe and astonishment. She first assembled the hardwood frame with four carved legs, and along a flat piece of wood that connected the two ends of the oblong frame she stuck the gourds by their mouths firmly with tree resin.

She then covered each of the holes in the sides of the gourds with silky laminæ which she obtained from the nests of the munyovu wasp, also stuck firmly with tree resin. The gourds were arranged under the central plank in gradually diminishing size. Then came the pieces of wood that formed the trapdoor, also arranged in the same order according to size, each piece directly across a corresponding gourd resonator. The strips of wood were suspended above their resonators by two lengths of thong.

Thus the xylophone—the marimba—was born. Soon this melodious companion of the feast and the dance was sending its notes through the festive air, each note as gentle as a maiden's promise. The xylophone is a living instrument which can bend its notes to fit the blood-warming melody of a wedding song or harshen its voice and convey to the human mind the clamour and dark horrors of war—or the thrilling excitement and suspense of the hunt. Even without the accompaniment of a human voice one can tell a whole story with the xylophone alone. One can use the voice of this holy instrument to create various moods in one's audience. While other instruments speak to the ears, the xylophone speaks to the heart and the soul. Indeed it is an instrument worthy of bearing the name of the Goddess of Music.

* * * * *

In building xylophones only hard and well seasoned woods must be used. Great care must be exercised in selecting the wood for the various notes. There must be no pores, or the slightest crack. Timber from a hardwood tree once struck by lightning is excellent. These sacred instruments must never be built in times of war and famine; neither must they be made by people who are sterile or spiritually perverted, or physically deformed in any way.

"Great Marimba,"—the voice of the tremendous woman, a cook, was low and full of great love and respect—"it is with great regret that your servants failed to cook your favourite dish of stamped peanuts today, for lo, the old mortar has finally worn through its bottom and is now nothing but a useless hollow log. It is only good for firewood now and we must ask the woodcarvers to fashion us a new one."

"Do not burn the old mortar, Oh Mandingwe," said the princess with a mysterious smile. "The truth is that I have been waiting for something like this to happen for quite some time. I shall transform it into something which will add yet more pleasure to the lives of the people whom the gods have entrusted to me to rule and guide along the paths of peace and wisdom."

"Marimba is indeed the mother of wisdom," whispered the fat cook.

"Nobody is the parent of wisdom in this world, Mandingwe. I am nothing but a puppet serving the will of Those-we-do-not-see, and I try to serve as best I can. Now bring me the skin of a newly killed wildebeest, and also send Kamago the woodcarver to me."

"As you say, Oh Marimba," said the cook respectfully, falling on her face in obeisance and then crawling backwards out of the Royal Hut.

Marimba turned the old nut-grinding mortar into the first drum the world had ever seen and for the first time since the dawn of creation the forests shook to the pulsing beat of a drum. This instrument became so popular with the Wakambi that almost everybody wanted to have a drum in his own hut. The woodcarvers were very busy indeed. The princess Marimba made them of different sizes, each with a different quality of sound, from the loud hollow boom to the gentle pow-pow. The big ones were known as the 'male drums'; smaller ones were 'female drums', and the very small ones that children could carry around were known as 'sparrow drums'.

The largest drums she ordered to be reserved for purposes of worship only and these had the symbol of the River of Eternity carved into them in a continuous pattern all round, and on many of these drums were also carved symbols representing passages from the great poems of creation and sacred symbols of Spiritual Secret Knowledge. This she did to preserve the knowledge of the Wakambi for all time. Men were elected to look after these drums and this became their sole duty in life. These 'Drummers of High Honour' had to daub the instruments periodically with animal fat to preserve both the wood and the skin. When a drum was attacked by a wood-boring pest they had to wrap it in wet animal skins and then leave it to steam in a hollow anthill which had been heated by a fire till it was red hot.

When a drum deteriorated beyond repair it was the duty of the oldest woodcarver to carve a new one—an exact replica in every detail, and the old one was buried with the full burial honours with which a chief is buried.

Marimba's drums became so popular that even the Masai copied them, but not for peaceful purposes. One day when Mpushu was carrying a number of drums to a village of the Wakambi he was set upon by three Masai who knocked him flying into a muddy stream and stole off with the drums, but only after requesting him to fetch some more as they would like to steal those too.

The Masai were the first to use the drum for relaying signals, especially military signals.

Give a Masai a stone and he will hit something or somebody with it. Give him any piece of wood and he will turn it into a club with which to brain you. 'Peace' or 'peaceful' are words that do not occur in the vocabulary of the Masai. To them these are absolutely meaningless abstractions.

With the birth of the drum came the birth of new dances in the land of the Wakambi—dances like the bupiro-mukiti, or the dance of life, performed by both male and female dancers, or the chukuza ya sandanda, the dance of the baboon, which is performed by male dancers only. This is the most muscle-punishing dance that can ever be performed. All these dances were invented for one reason only—expression of tribal religion and the release of that beneficial life-force dormant in every human being, but which, when released, makes one feel closer in the 'arms of Eternity'.

Also some of the dances performed by young people, like the famous 'love dance' of the Kavirondo, and the gqashiya of the Nguni, were invented so that the young people might find an opportunity to use up their excess energy

Little Nonikwe was waiting. She was waiting with great impatience for something big and exciting to happen and she could hardly conceal the wild excitement she felt; it lighted her face like a midnight beacon. This was all because Nonikwe knew something the other girls in her village did not know as yet. She knew that the Great One, Marimba, was on her way to spend the night in the village—the very village in which Nonikwe's uncle, Mutengu, was headman.

Little Nonikwe was a pathetic creature. She was not only a hunchback, but she was also totally blind. But all this was amply compensated by the great and rare gift the gods gave her of seeing things clearly long before they happened.

This gift had saved the little hunchback child from being destroyed at the age of eight as all crippled and deformed children were normally destroyed according to the laws of the Wakambi. A child born with any defect was, however, allowed to live till the age of eight to see if it had any special gifts like seeing into the future or the past, reading minds or communicating thoughts to animals.

Little Nonikwe was allowed to live and she lived like a chieftainess in her uncle's village. She was the most well-hidden and well-guarded piece of property in the village, and this was because Mutengu had a bitter rival and enemy in another new village just beyond the river. This enemy was Lusu, the father of Nonikwe herself. When Nonikwe had been born, Lusu had been so disgusted with the child with which his wife had presented him that he had publicly declared that his wife had slept with a night-walking demon.

Nonikwe's mother had been disgracefully driven from Lusu's village and had sought refuge in the village of her brother Mutengu, where she died of a broken heart two moons later. Years had passed, the little girl had grown, and soon word had got around that she was a Blessed One, gifted with powers beyond human concept. When he heard this, Lusu the rascal tried to move the very stars and the mountains to get Nonikwe back. Mutengu had not only refused; he had seized Lusu and beaten him within a thumb's length of his fat and rascally life.

Mutengu and Lusu had since been deadly enemies and to get his own back, Lusu developed the habit of reporting directly to Marimba with all kinds of accusations against Mutengu—acts of corruption and many breaches of the laws of the Wakambi. These accusations were, of course, utterly false and unfounded.

Eventually Marimba decided to pay Mutengu a secret visit in order to find out for herself if he was really as corrupt and evil as Lusu had made him out to be.

But Marimba had forgotten about Nonikwe. The little hunchback had actually dreamt what the great princess intended to do and woke up early that morning to warn her uncle to expect a secret visit from his queen some time in the afternoon. Mutengu, though startled by this warning, had acted quickly upon it because the blind little hunchback had never before been wrong with her predictions. He had ordered scouts to be posted to give him early warning of the approach of the great queen and her retinue. He had made his wives prepare all manner of food to give the peerless Marimba a welcome feast fit for one of her high and queenly position.

Mutengu had nothing to fear from a visit by his chieftainess because he had no secrets to hide. And not only was he as loyal as the southern wind but he was also as honest as a worker bee. But he did not want to be caught unprepared in anything and he was a strong believer in giving each and every visitor to his village a welcome in accordance with his or her stature.

Mutengu was a very popular headman. Every man and woman in the village could vouch for his great kindness, courage and honesty, and they were all prepared to defend him with their lives against any scandal-mongering back-biter.

The huge clay pots were full of delicious buffalo meat. There were great basins full of well cooked yams and corn cakes. There were also wooden trays full of roast wild fowl, partridge and guinea fowl. There were baskets full of wild figs and stewed marulas, and large cakes of fresh honey from his own beehives. Mutengu was the first man in the land of the tribes to keep bees. He kept them in hollow anthills, and handled them after drugging them with dagga smoke. He had also discovered that bees were inclined to leave him in peace when he dressed himself in a hyæna skin kaross.

Thus the great feast was prepared and brought in readiness for the unannounced arrival of the great queen Marimba. All the villagers settled down to await the arrival of someone who did not know she was already expected, whose surprise visit was a surprise no more. Visitors from surrounding kraals and villages came as usual to have a free meal in this generous headman's village, and as usual they told him a lot of tales-that-are-not-true and departed with full bellies and oily smiles. It was also customary for angry men to bring their disputes to Mutengu's kraal and long arguments and trials took place under the Tree of Justice in the centre of the village. Fines were paid in ivory, ebony, and copper ore, and malefactors were taken outside and executed.

Life was taking its normal course in Mutengu's village. An old and very tired-looking man came into the teeming village at midday accompanied by his remarkably beautiful daughter and begged a guardsman at the gate to let him spend the night in their spare hut, as he was very tired and had come a long way. This was not unusual and the guards were all too happy to admit the old doddering traveller and his daughter. The shy, beautiful girl greatly interested the burly guards and many were the ravening glances cast in her direction.

The old man was given the whole haunch of a buffalo and asked to eat his fill; what was left he could take with him on his journey the following day.

The rest of the afternoon was taken up by ordinary activities, such as hauling yelling prisoners to the council tree for trial.

* * * * *

The sun was already setting beyond the western mountains and lengthy shadows were creeping eastwards when headman Mutengu completed his duties in administering tribal law. And still the queen of the Wakambi had not arrived. A small doubt began to gnaw at the back of the mind of the great Induna; he began to wonder for the first time whether his little deformed niece was wrong in her prophecy. Eventually he strode into her hut and knelt down beside the blind child, holding her hand gently, reassuringly.

"Little one, for once the little spirits have played a trick upon my niece, for lo, the queen Marimba has not come yet."

"But she has, Oh honourable uncle, the queen of the Wakambi is here. I can feel the pulse of her thoughts."

Mutengu was aghast: "Child! What words are these? My scouts have brought no news of the coming of the queen. They have seen no warrior escort. And yet you say that the royal Marimba is already within this village!"

"She is, Oh uncle. I receive her thoughts quite clearly. At this moment she is pleased with the joke she has played on you, and she is convinced that my real father Lusu had accused you falsely."

"Where is she?" Mutengu demanded. "Has she made herself invisible?"

"No, uncle. Tell me, how many visitors are spending the night with us?"

"Well over a hundred, child, men and women, young and old."

"The Great One has come into the village as a common visitor, my uncle. You must command all visitors to report to your Great Hut and there I shall pick her out for you."

The one hundred and ten visitors were gathered at the Great Hut and a sumptuous supper was in progress. Already the induna knew that one of these many women was Marimba and one thing remained—the identification parade!

Mutengu led his little blind niece, gently holding her hand, past all the guests. He noticed how most of the visitors shrank slightly with revulsion as the deformed child approached. He saw this and he smiled; if only these fools knew that the little deformed child was the equivalent of ten so-called normal human beings. Led by powers beyond human comprehension, the young girl made her way towards the old man and his daughter. The child knelt down beside the girl and gently removed the kaross of respect with which she had covered her head. Mutengu immediately recognised his chieftainess—in spite of her shaven head and the false scar she had improvised with a piece of fish bladder. Mutengu gently pulled off the scar and the great, mischievous eyes of Marimba smiled softly at him.

“My queen . . . living goddess of the Wakambi . . . what is the meaning of this cruel joke?”

“I heard that you were a corrupt and vicious man who broke every tribal law laid down. I wanted to see for myself, Oh Induna, and I am glad to say that I found all accusations against you false and groundless.”

The assembled visitors fell on their faces in the presence of their great queen and a deep silence fell upon the gathering like a thick skin blanket. Then came Marimba's clear voice: “Arise, my people, and let us enjoy our meal. Then we shall perform a little dance to thank our host for his great kindness and generosity.” And turning to Mutengu she spoke softly: “Tell me, Oh Mutengu, how did you know about my secret arrival?”

“I shall give the little one a gift to remember me by. And when we have unseated her evil father in the village across the river we shall appoint your niece as headwoman of that village for the rest of her life.”

A roar of applause greeted the announcement. Men stood up and raised their right hands in salute to the little Nonikwe, Headwoman-for-life of a village and district. And then, into the hands of the little girl Marimba pressed the newest instrument of music that she had invented. It was a ‘hand xylophone’—a mukimbe—made entirely of reeds.

A mukimbe is an instrument particularly suited for use by blind people or those left weak and convalescing after an attack of one of the numerous tropical diseases. Many a convalescent owed his recovery to the sweet, birdlike, soothing notes of the mukimbe. Thus this instrument soon acquired the nickname of ‘the sick one’s comforter’.

A good mukimbe is constructed as follows: The bulrush reeds must be cut in the middle of summer when fully grown but not yet hard or dry. They must be of equal thickness (a man’s little finger) and of equal length (from the wrist to the elbow). Eight of these are cut and woven together with lengths of reed bark till the whole thing looks like a miniature raft. More strips of green reed are then attached to the raft, fixed both ends, and a strip of wood is then inserted to lift these strips away from the raft in the middle. The whole contraption is then left to dry in the sun for ten days. The woven knots tighten and the strips become taut while the spirit of music enters into them. The strips must all be of unequal breadth and arranged in order of thickness. For an additional rattle effect tiny pebbles can be inserted in the hollow reeds and the openings sealed with tree resin.

* * * * *

The blind child was overjoyed. Tears of pure gratitude welled from her sightless eyes and she clutched the instrument to her heart. She wept as if her soul would melt. "Thank you, Oh my queen. I honour you with all my heart, and may you grow as tall as the tallest of tall trees."

"Now, now, little Nonikwe, do not cry so. I am going to see to it that you are happy for the rest of your life and that you will never want for anything. Now come, all my people, let us dance before we go to sleep. I have a new dance for you, my lazy ones—the 'Three-Fire Dance'."

* * * * *

The women had become wands of living fire; they were leaping and swaying, twisting and shaking, like things gone completely mad. Marimba was leading the group of dancers in the centre, symbolising the 'flame of life' while the other groups of dancers represented the forces that try to snuff out the flame. It was a wild, uninhibited, savage dance that sent the flood of desire surging through the bodies of the men and brought tears into the eyes of the old ones. Every woman of the village was now taking part in the strangest dance of all time, while all the men watched intensely, deeply moved.

But elsewhere in the village three men were conferring—three whose hearts were full of evil and whose souls were caught in the dark webs of evil being hatched against the peerless Marimba. One, called Luchiza, was nothing but a stripling boy, the first-born son of the headman Mutengu. The second was a one-eyed scoundrel named Mbomongo and the third was Kalembi, the old man who had posed as Marimba's father when they entered the village earlier that day. Kalembi had found an opportunity to slip away unnoticed during the earlier part of the dancing and he now addressed the two others in a bitter and cracked voice: "We cannot allow this thing to go on! If we do not put a stop to this woman's antics soon we shall all be turned into a mob of brainless, capering fools who will do nothing but dance ourselves from the childbirth-hut to the very grave, and on to the land of Forever-Night. I tell you, we have to do something about this."

"Tsaaaiiee!" spat the young man Luchiza, the son of Mutengu, "I am a firm believer that the woman is mad. Who ever heard of a nation of dancers? That is what we are already—a mad nation of capering idiots!"

"Well, my lords," said Mbomongo with an obscene leer, "if you want to get rid of Marimba I am the man to do it for you. I would enjoy nothing better."

"What do you propose we do, Kalembi?" asked the young man Luchiza, "you are the wisest one of the three of us and all the deciding must come from you."

"In two years' time," said the old man slowly, "we are going to celebrate the escape of Odu and Amarava from the lost land of the First People, and that will give us the opportunity to get rid not only of this loathsome female but of her impish son Kahawa as well."

"I would never relish an open fight with that left-handed madman," said young Luchiza. "It is easier to fight an angry rhinoceros than engage Kahawa in battle. The man is a monster and to him fear is an unknown thing."

"But an ordinary drug can vanquish the fiercest beast, Oh Luchiza," said the old man Kalembi. "And during that festival there will be many an opportunity to slip a drug into whatever mother or son would care to eat or drink."

"But Marimba is an immortal!" said Luchiza soberly. "You cannot kill an immortal, although you can seriously wound one."

"I just want to get Marimba into my hands for a few moments," said Kalembi. "And I want her drugged and helpless. Then I would not only make sure that she never again invented any new musical contraptions but also that she forever forgot who she was. I want to turn her into a zombie on that day, my sons. You forsaken fools seem to have forgotten that I am the wizard-lord of the Wakambi!"

"You mean to say you intend tampering with that immortal's brain?" cried the young man. "But even you will never dare to go that far, Kalembi!"

"Somewhere in the forest is a slowly dying god, and this god is willing to reward with immortality anyone who can deliver Marimba into his hands," said the wizard-lord. "I would like to be the one to do so."

"You mean Nangai, the Evil, the monster who nearly destroyed the Wakambi!" cried Luchiza. "I would watch my step with that heavenly renegade if I were you, Oh Wizard-Lord."

"I am willing to take any risk to attain immortality, my boy," the old man replied.

Meanwhile at the Great Hut the 'Three Fire Dance' had reached a shattering climax as Marimba, now symbolizing the human soul that cannot die, leapt high into the air with arms spread out appealingly to the gods on high, leapt into the air to fall back into a forest of hands raised by the circle of women below her. The women bore their beloved queen in triumph to her sleeping hut. The assembled men let out a thunderous cheer and raised their war weapons high in salute.

In the darkness, beyond the light of the flickering torches, an old man's cold narrow eyes blazed with unspeakable hatred and bitter contempt, and a one-eyed man of great ugliness sneered, while a young man whispered: "In two years, you putrid slut—in just two years' time!"

A dark cloud had formed in the peaceful skies of Marimba's life—a dark cloud that was to explode into a ravaging storm of incredible fury.

* * * * *

Lusu was scared, and he had a very good reason to be. When one has slandered an innocent man for many days with intent to destroy him one becomes scared when one learns that all one's lies have been exposed and the victim's name cleared of all the slime one hurled at it. But Lusu had reason to be more scared; his victim had challenged him to mortal combat in the presence of the people of the two villages. And now he stood in the middle of the village clearing, his cowardly eyes so misty with fear that the hundreds of people sitting around watching him seemed strangely unreal—like ghosts in a distant spirit land. The only thing that felt real to him was his drenched loinskin.

There was a thunderous cheer as Mutengu crawled out of his hut and made straight for Lusu, and everybody saw with great surprise that he was completely unarmed. The watching villagers were even more surprised when his voice rang out harshly: "I intend to make this a battle without weapons. It is my intention to give that lying dog a beating such as no-one has ever seen before. Drop that club, Lusu, and use your bare hands—I dare you!"

Lusu felt his shaky courage evaporating fast. He had depended on this club because he was quite skilled with it. He wept openly with fear and the villagers howled with laughter. Cries of "shame" and "coward" assailed his ears and his nerve collapsed altogether. He turned and tried to run, but one of his own advisors kicked him in the buttocks, cuffed him soundly and pushed him back into the clearing. Mutengu tore into him with the violence of a thunder-storm.

Violent clouds of dust were stirred up by the feet of the fighting men and for a long time the only sounds were those of blows well and truly landed. Then finally a loud scream was torn from the throat of the coward Lusu and he turned and ran like a madman. He bowled men over in his great hurry to escape the wrath of Mutengu. He leapt a high fence and thudded to the ground beyond like a hippopotamus. He got to his feet again and sped blindly into the forest with Mutengu and all the villagers, Marimba included, in hot pursuit. When he noticed the pursuit was gaining on him he urged his short fat legs to increase their effort.

Lusu ran on and on—like the wind through the forest. Loud sobbing gasps left his labouring lungs through a dry mouth. He ran on heedless of the thorns that tore his feet and heedless of the fact that his loinskin had fallen off and that his great shiny black buttocks were exposed to the glare of the sun.

Then the voice of Mutengu was heard above the excited shouts and shrieks of the villagers—a voice raised in fear and great urgency: "Do not go there, Lusu . . . watch out!"

The pursuing villagers fell back, but Lusu saw in this an opportunity to run all the faster and he ran straight into Mutengu's apiary. Like a cloud of dark midnight vengeance, vast swarms of bees set on him. Lusu screamed horribly as the bees all but smothered him; he screamed as they stung him on every part of his swarthy sweating stark-naked body.

He ran screeching to the riverside and leapt blindly into the murky waters. As they closed over his head he suddenly felt incredible pain as the mighty jaws of a giant crocodile closed around his fat thighs.

He thought he saw a gleam of great pleasure in the eyes of the crocodile. That was the last he saw. But there was time for another thought: Had he recognised in those eyes, the eyes of his long-dead wife—mother of Nonikwe? Had she been reincarnated . . .?

* * * * *

The silver moon was high in the midnight heavens and the great lake Nyanza was like a plain of shimmering silver in the land of Tura-ya-Moya; the waters of the great lake were so still that one could count the stars reflected from the surface. The night was oppressively hot and humid. In the scowling forests bordering the lake there lay a deep and inscrutable silence.

Very surprising indeed was the total absence of animals; no lions roared and no leopards coughed their opinions about. There was no place on earth like the dark forests that bordered the lake in those days. They were forests of abandon, of desolation, of Hell itself. They did not crawl with life, but with death—in its most hideous form.

It was because the lake Nyanza was not an ordinary lake in those days. It was the Heart of the very Earth and the gateway to lands strange and utterly terrible. These lands were once on the surface of the earth but had sunk to its core as a result of the evil that inhabited them. The gods wanted to bury this evil land forever to save the race of Man. The forests around this lake were the haunts of hideous things emerging periodically from the bowels of the earth: Life Eaters, Night Howlers, Fire Brides and Viper Maidens, who hunted each other the whole night long. Woe betide any venturesome human creature stupid enough to be lost in those forests!

In the great silence under the light of the moon a grim and deadly hunt was in progress this night. The Viper Maidens were stalking the Night Howlers whose blood they drank. Here and there one could catch a glimpse of a naked female form with a long tail and eyes like those of cats, darting from bush to bush in a desperate search for the huge monsters that were the source of their food and sport. Evil was hunting itself for lack of human victims and such hunts by Lower World creatures are well known for their utter pitilessness. Lo! is it not said in our Words of Wisdom that 'evil hunts and destroys itself'?

While this great, silent hunt was in progress in the moon-bathed forests, the slowly dying outcast god Nangai was lying on his soft bed of silver cloud in the dark depths of a cave that he knew as his home. For once the god experienced a flicker of hope: at long last the woman he needed in order to survive was about to be delivered into his hands and into his mercy. The beautiful immortal woman who had done so much to bring happiness into the land of ungrateful men had been betrayed by one of her son's wives, Lozana, who poured an evil drug into her food. This was on the occasion of the Festival of Odu and the drug had caused Marimba to fall into a deep coma—and into the arms of her ruthless enemy.

The old wizard-lord of the Wakambi had vowed to hand over the princess to Nangai in exchange for immortality. The fierce Kahawa was far away when this happened, having been lured away by the scheming group with a false report that a great lion was terrorizing one of the new outpost villages on the border of the land of the Wakambi. Kahawa, who hated lions and loved to hunt them, had set out with Mpushu to the distant village to direct the hunt.

And this night, three days after the wizard-lord of the Wakambi had terrorized the shocked people into making him Chief, a long canoe was gliding its silent way to the island home of Nangai, the Outcast God. There were five people in the canoe: Marimba who was still unconscious, Mbomongo the one-eyed, Luchiza the son of Mutengu, the old wizard-lord himself, and Kahawa's treacherous second wife Lozana. All these people hoped to gain immortality from Nangai as a prize for delivering Marimba, to whom they had done the most cowardly thing one human being can do to another. The very stars knew already that Marimba would never sing again . . .

Nangai had, on receiving a dream message from the triumphant wizard-lord, promised to use his waning powers of godhood to protect the passengers of the midnight canoe from attack by any of the many kinds of unearthly monsters haunting the lake and its environs. Now he was lying on his fantastic bed of shimmering cloud awaiting their arrival with great impatience; watching with expressionless eyes as the poison in his body attacked the remaining stump of his upper arm; watching without feeling as great blisters erupted down his left side and burst into purulent oozing sores. A god knows no fear and Nangai was not afraid, nor did he feel any pain. He was only interested in containing his existence for reasons he could not bother to find out.

Footsteps sounded somewhere in the darkness beyond the light shed by his own radiance, and he sat up as the wizard-lord of the Wakambi stepped into his presence, leading Marimba by the arm and closely followed by his evil friends.

Nangai did not bother to waste a glance on the nervous humans before him. He was only interested in Marimba—his one chance of survival—and it was she that he caught by the wrist and drew close to him. Marimba knelt down with downcast eyes like the soulless puppet she had become; the god sank his hollow claws into her upper arm and siphoned some of her blood through them into his own system. In front of the astonished mortals a strange thing happened to the outcast god; the blisters covering his body from head to foot gradually healed and a new left arm began to grow. His hard cold eyes lighted with a brilliance of new-born stars and his powerful body started vibrating with a extraordinary quality and power.

Eventually he released the woman's arm and stood regarding her in great bewilderment. With a voice of strange hardness he addressed the wizard-lord for the first time: "What did you do to this immortal female?"

"I made her into a zombie, Oh great Nangai," the man replied in gloating tones. "She is now completely at your mercy, and not only does she fail to remember who she is and what she was—she is totally incapable of independent thought of any kind. She shall remain like this forever—a beautiful, soulless, immortal zombie."

"Wretch of a mortal!" cried Nangai. "You dare to gloat over what you have done? Does not this blind little brain of yours realise the enormity of your crime? You have committed a crime so great that the very stars are weeping at the sight of it."

Fear and naked terror seized the old wizard-lord at the strange turn of events and with a hoarse scream he turned to flee. But the rejuvenated god seized him and held him fast while his evil followers fainted one by one. "No, mortal, you do not so easily escape the consequences of your vile sacrilege. Both you and I stand here ready for judgment by one much higher than I."

"But my lord . . .," begged the old wizard.

"Be silent, you sinful wretch! As a result of your deed I must now surrender myself to punishment by the other gods. I only hope that I am tried by one who is just and impartial.

At that precise moment there came a flash of incredibly brilliant light and a clap of blood-freezing thunder. In the whirling mist of many-coloured light that filled the cavern a dark form took shape and soon, as the flaming mist dispersed, the whimpering wizard-lord found himself staring into the great eyes of a silvery giantess whose very presence seemed to shrivel his dirty soul.

"Merciful Ma, mother of the stars," said Nangai, throwing himself flat on his face, "this unworthy creature, unfit to bear the name of god, yields himself into your mercy and justice. And he also yields into your mercy the mortals who committed this evil crime upon the person of Marimba, your loyal servant who has done so much for mankind."

"That does not sound at all like you, Oh Nangai," said Ma coldly. "When one hears you speak in this way one is tempted to wonder just what has become of your usual insolent bluster—and why you speak as though you have at last discovered how to distinguish good from evil."

"Great Ma, I began repenting my evil ways immediately I saw what this wretched mortal has done to your servant, and it occurred to me that for a god to stoop so low as to tolerate the committing of crimes of this sort in his name is, in fact, the deepest form of evil. It occurred to me that gods should fight against evil and neither countenance nor encourage it."

"That is indeed so, Oh Nangai; a god who works for evil principles is a traitor to his kind, because while the good principles which we support stand for Existence and Life, the former characterize Non-existence and Death. And now I am going to pass sentence on you, Nangai. You have reformed, that is true; but the taint of your sins still clings to you, and therefore you are not allowed to return to Tura-ya-Moya, but you are demoted from god to ordinary High Immortal and you are to be exiled into the land of mortals until the end of time."

Nangai bowed his head and said at length: "Your sentence is milder than my crimes, oh Great Mother of All, and I praise you for your leniency. But what about this poor woman, this beautiful victim of the ingratitude of mortal men?"

"It is my will that you be the husband and guardian of Marimba until the very world ceases to be. Marimba had a great love for turning evil things into good, and it is strange indeed to find that as a result of her terrible suffering she has helped in reforming an evil god."

"Please restore her brain to her, Great Goddess; please heal the brain of the one I love!"

"No!" said Ma firmly. "You must take this beautiful woman back to her son and her people as she is, and you must rule and guide the Wakambi for more than a hundred years with this beautiful zombie always by your side—an immortal monument to the evil-heartedness and ingratitude of the creatures known as Man—wanton creatures who destroy ruthlessly those things they should love and revere; unnatural beasts that destroy the trees whose shelter they seek, and defile with excrement the cool streams from which they heal their thirst."

"She imparted happiness to the spawn of Man; she gave the race of Man music, but what reward has Man given her? Take her, Nangai, and carry her back to the village of the Wakambi. Love and cherish her, soulless though she be, because physically she will yet bear you a hundred sons and fifty daughters and these shall be the rulers of the Wakambi and many other future tribes. Rule with wisdom and strength for a hundred summers, and after that you can retire with your beloved Marimba to a golden sanctuary I shall prepare for you at the bottom of Lake Nyanza."

"And as for these evil mortals here who sought fame in delivering out a friend of theirs, I now deliver them out to the mercy of the Viper Maidens."

With these words the goddess slowly vanished, while a host of Viper Maidens appeared on the scene. Dreadful were the shrieks of the wizard-lord when one Viper Maiden sank her fangs into the scruff of his neck and terrible were his struggles and contortions as her venom coursed through his scrawny body. Lozana, the treacherous wife of Kahawa, died shrieking for her husband while the fangs of another Viper Maiden were still buried in one of her ripe buttocks.

Dreadful was the hissing of the happy Viper Maidens as they feasted under the silent moon.

In the dark cave of Nangai the re-born god turned his eyes upon the woman he desired with every vein in his body. She was still kneeling where he had left her, like a soulless toy a child had forgotten. He came towards her and she raised her head and looked up at him with great empty eyes. Tears sprang to the eyes of Nangai and he stooped and raised the beautiful thing that once was Marimba to its feet—drew it close to him and wept his heart out. Then he laid it gently on his cloudy couch.

"Tomorrow we are going home, my beloved. You shall see Kahawa and Rarati and the rest of your people again. Kahawa has come back after finding that the story of the lion was false. Already he and Mpushu and Rarati have rallied all the people and they are searching for you. Do you hear?"

He might as well have spoken to a carved idol. She merely stared at him, her lips parted . . .

Nangai took his unresisting wife into his arms and kissed her lips for the first time. Her body trembled with a feeling she no longer recognised and her eyes closed in sudden fear and shyness. Outside the cavern the moon seemed brighter and a pleased smile seemed to linger on its round face.

STAND FOR EVER, OH ZIMA-MBJE

(Compiled from numerous old Mashona, Venda, Bechuana and Varozwi songs and stories)

THIS is the story of the Lost Phœnician empire in Southern Africa, a story which is still sung and told around village fires in South and Central Africa today, a true story—it has thousands of relics in the hands of witchdoctors to support it.

Badly rusted and crumbling swords of ancient Greek manufacture, old gold coins and parts of bronze shields and helmets, bronze spears and Egyptian battle axes, all of which are in the secret possession of witchdoctors throughout Southern Africa, confirm the truth of the story of Zima-Mbje.

THE COMING OF THE STRANGE ONES

LUMBEDU, the witchdoctor, had not slept well at all the previous night; in fact, for him the night had been one long hideous, screaming nightmare in which he had been alternately chased, strangled, mauled and torn apart by no less than ten different kinds of monsters, from giant crocodiles to bright red monkeys with ten eyes apiece.

The cause of all these unpleasant nocturnal visitations from the Demon World was not far to seek at all: it was nothing more than the fact that the rather overweight Lumbedu had stuffed his capacious belly well-nigh to bursting during the feast held in his honour on the previous day. This feast had been held by one of his patients he had cured of a bad fever by forcing down claypots-full, one after the other, of a strong purgative into the luckless man's stomach, with the result that although the poor fellow had been quickly cured of his fever, his stomach and intestines had been almost purged out of existence.

During the feast Lumbedu had brought forth loud shouts of amazement and admiration from the rest of the guests by excelling himself in his elephantine appetite. He had eaten the large half of a goat—haunch, ribs, shoulder, neck and head—pushing the smaller portion across to a starveling who had been staring at him with bright astonished eyes and a wet, drooling mouth. Then he had attacked a great bowl of boiled ox intestines and a pile of hot corn cakes, flavoured with kaffirbeer, with the ferocity of an invading conquerer. He had concluded this most royal repast with an almighty draught of two full claypots of bubbling cornbeer.

* * * * *

The midsummer sun was going down and the distant forests were now veiled by a smoky, mistlike haze, which made them look farther away than they really were. Wisps of smoke rose into the windless pale blue sky from great kraals and villages, while loud in the ears were the lowing of cows and the hollow bellowing of bulls as large herds of cattle were driven homewards from the forest-fringed pastures.

The rays of the slowly departing God of Light shone on the sweat-drenched face of the panting boy who was running through the forest as if Watamaraka, the Queen of Evil herself, was after his blood. He was a very frightened boy indeed—anyone could tell from his eyes. What had he seen?

Follow the boy, my children—dark-brown, thin, naked, swift as a wild eagle of the hills. Follow the boy to whom the breath of fear has given the strength of a thousand men and the endurance of a wild buffalo. His toes and feet are bleeding—his left thigh is red with blood where a cruel thorn from a meva bush is deeply buried in his flesh. But he runs on heedless of pain and tiredness.

What had he seen? Guess, my children, guess!

Lo, he bursts through the forest and before him rears the stockade of a big kraal, a kraal consisting of sixteen huts surrounded by a stockade of pointed poles interwoven with thorny creepers. It is the kraal of his father, Lumbedu the witchdoctor, and the boy runs into the kraal as if he were the Seventh Wind itself.

"Father, father," he cries shrilly.

Ojoyo, his mother, sees him and comes waddling fatly to investigate the reason for her son's hurt fright.

"My son, what is the matter?" Her fat greasy arms encircle the frightened boy and he collapses. She carries him away like a baby to her hut and there, after removing the thorn from his thigh and washing his many wounds, she makes him drink a bowl of sleep-causing luika water, and he falls fast asleep.

"I think he must have seen an animal in the forest," says Vunakwe, the third wife, to Ojoyo later.

"My son is no coward," snaps Ojoyo. "I still insist he must have been frightened by an evil spirit in the forest, Oh Vunakwe; he saw one of the demons which afflicted his father only this morning. Dare you try to contradict me?"

"I do not wish to argue with you Ojoyo," says the peace-loving Vunakwe. "It is best that we ask the child himself if he awakes . . ."

"If he awakes?" Ojoyo explodes. "If he awakes? Do you wish my son not to wake up then Vunakwe? Do you want him to die?"

"No, no!" cries Vunakwe, cringing from the advancing Ojoyo. "My tongue slipped; I meant to say when he awakes, believe me."

"You witch, you know very well that you meant what you said. I am going to . . ."

But she gets no further as her attention is claimed by another of the wives of Lumbedu.

* * * * *

The sun was high in the silver skies when the boy Mulumbi, who had come running into the kraal on the previous evening, crawled painfully into Lumbedu's hut and knelt near the low entrance, facing his many parents who regarded him with bloodshot eyes and blank expressions on their haggard faces.

"Father," said Mulumbi at last, "I have something to tell you and I only ask you, please, to believe me."

"What is it?" snapped Lumbedu, who was as bad a parent as he was cowardly and selfish. "Speak up and then get out!"

"Father," said the boy, "we were out hunting wild cats with the other boys from Songozo's village yesterday afternoon; we went farther and farther into the forest until we reached the Zambezi and then started to follow the river eastwards. We did not find any wild cats but we did find a young buck which we speared and roasted and shared. We were still eating when Mbimba stood up and gave a loud shout of great fear. We all threw down our meat and grabbed our spears and bows thinking that some animal was about to attack us. 'Look over there—what is it?,' cried Mbimba. We all looked and saw something terrible coming up the Zambezi. Believe me, my parents, it was something terrible!"

"What was it?" chorused Lumbedu and Ojoyo together.

"It was a canoe, a very big canoe, father. It looked like a terrible serpent of the waters. Along its side ran two rows of long paddles and a great sheet of what looked like a skin was stretched on a long stick that hung on many ropes across a tall pole that stood in the centre of the giant canoe. There were three great knives attached to the front end and a carving shaped like a man, with hair as shaggy as a lion's mane. The other boys fled, my father, but I decided to hide in the grass to see what the canoe would do next. It came nearer and nearer . . ."

"My brave little son," murmured Ojoyo. "Go on, what happened next?"

"To my surprise, the canoe came closer and closer to the river bank and then it stopped. I saw men running on its top and the long rows of paddles being drawn up. Great metal vessels were lowered to scoop up water—lowered on ropes down the side of the great canoe. So near was it that I could see the many men on it quite clearly and they were the strangest looking men you ever saw. They had pink skins—they were pink all over; they had hair like the mane of lions—hair that fell to their shoulders. Some had hair as black and shiny as that of a panther, some red as fire. But one had hair the colour of corn in autumn. It was terrible—I was so afraid I just lay in the grass, all strength gone from me. I saw some of the men leap over the sides of the great canoe; they leapt naked and with their long hair flowing behind their heads. They leapt into the water and started swimming and splashing in the Zambezi like so many pink fish. Some were wrestling and laughing and some just swam about, leisurely, enjoying the cool water.

"Then a group of them ran out of the water on to the bank and started coming to where I lay in the long grass, too terrified to move. I closed my eyes and lay quite still. I heard their footsteps coming nearer and their voices grew louder. Then I heard a shout as the foremost of them had seen me. I felt a wet hand seize me roughly by the wrist and haul me to my feet in one movement. I found myself looking deep into the green eyes of one of the strange ones, my parents . . ."

"Iaia-eeee!—no human being can ever have green eyes," said Lumbedu. "No human being can ever have long hair like that of a lion, and a pink skin. This brat is lying!"

"Be quiet Lumbedu," screamed Ojoyo. "I know my children more than anybody else does and I know when they tell lies and when they tell the truth. Mulumbi is not lying."

By this time the boy Mulumbi was bathed in sweat, his hands shook like leaves in the wind and a look of wild fear distorted his young boyish features. It was Lulinda who first noticed this. Worry clouded her beautiful face and she whispered to Lumbedu: "Be careful, husband, please be careful; he has had a great shock; he is a very frightened child."

"I have never seen this boy like this," spoke Vunakwe. "He is not a child who is easy to frighten and I know he tells the truth."

"Continue son, tell us the rest, then you can go and lie down in your hut," said Taundi. "You are not looking well."

"The strange ones have strange eyes, Oh my parents," continued Mulumbi, very slowly and weakly now. "Some have blue eyes, some brown, and the one who was holding me had green eyes. But those eyes seem to see through and through you; they make you feel naked and unhuman. I cried and struggled in the strange one's grasp, and he laughed and put me down. Then he gave me something small and shiny and round, something that was metal. But I must have dropped it as I turned and ran and ran with the alien laughter of the strange ones loud in my ears. I ran on and on without even looking behind me."

Suddenly he fell heavily to one side and lay still. His audience leapt to their feet, but it was Lulinda who reached him first and threw her arms about him. "He . . . he is dead . . . dead," she choked.

A heavy silence fell inside the hut, a silence as heavy as the veil of time that conceals the future from our eyes. Then Ojoyo began to sob softly.

The story spread like wildfire through the land and within a few days nearly everybody knew about the strange pink human beings in a great canoe that had come splashing up the timeless Zambezi. The boys from Songozo's village who had watched Mulumbi's adventure with the Strange Ones from a distant hill, swore he had told the truth.

The barbed claws of the vulture of fear slowly closed their grip on the frightened land and soon people began to be so scared about what they had heard that they no longer ventured outside the stockades of their villages and kraals except in groups of tens and twenties.

Warriors armed with long bone-tipped war spears and stone axes escorted women whenever they went to the stream to get water or to the cornfields to reap corn. Drums beat out long warnings that were relayed to the farthest villages, telling people to look out for strangers with pink skins and long hair. Soon all the villages along the banks of the Zambezi were empty of life, having been evacuated by the inhabitants.

Everyone began to live in fear, everybody that is, except two people who were carrying on a secret and adulterous love affair.

Night had fallen upon the earth like a panther-skin kaross, powdered with silver shining stars, and an ugly brooding silence lay heavily upon the fear-haunted land. Deep shadows, black and forbidding, lay like crouching demons under the trees—shadows that concealed prowling night-hunting animals such as leopards, hyænas and jackals. Only a madman dared walk into the forest in the middle of the night; only a madman—or a man on fire with passion and desire for another man's woman and who was willing to risk his life by keeping an adulterous appointment in an abandoned village on the bank of the Zambezi.

Chikongo, the son of Mburu, was the name of this man. He was actually risking his young life to keep an appointment with another man's wife—and that wife was Lulinda, the youngest wife of Lumbedu, the most feared witchdoctor in the land.

The heart of Chikongo pounded like a mad thing within him. He reached the abandoned village deep in the forest, the village which he and Lulinda had been using as a 'place of secret appointment' for one month now. He stood waiting just outside the fallen gate, his stone axe firmly gripped in his right hand, ready to deal with any animal that might emerge from the village to attack him. He stood thus for a long time until just as the moon rose above the trees in the east a low call sounded from the bushes close at hand. Lulinda! His stolen Lulinda had come . . . she had come!

Chikongo threw down his axe and jumped into the bushes with his hungry arms outstretched before him. Lulinda met him with a ferocity only a shade greater than his own and the love-demented pair went sprawling into the prickly embrace of a thornbush.

Chikongo picked himself up ruefully and helped Lulinda to her feet. Once more the lovers sought each other's arms, though in a more dignified and less violent way. Lulinda pressed herself fiercely against her lover's muscular frame, her nails digging deep and painfully into Chikongo's broad back, drawing blood. She kissed his pulsing neck, his ears, his forehead and his chest. Then she rubbed her nose fiercely against his. Then she broke free from his iron clutches and danced away with a low husky and musical laugh. The moonlight danced in her great big eyes like a silver ghost over a stream.

"Oh, my stolen one," sighed Chikongo, "I thought you were not coming."

"I very nearly did not come. I think that bloated female crocodile Ojoyo is getting suspicious. She kept on peeping into my hut to see if I was there, but I tricked her. I do think that this should be our last appointment."

His arm about her slender waist, they walked into the deserted village, unaware that many eyes were now watching them. Cautiously Lulinda and Chikongo entered the largest of the huts which happened to have a big hole in its grass roof, through which moonlight streamed, making a big splash of silver light on the pitted mud floor of the hut. It was here that the young man did an incredibly foolish thing—he did not explore the great hut first to see if it was really as empty as it seemed . . .

* * * * *

Lulinda woke very slowly and found to her surprise and horror that she had slept so long that dawn was breaking. The sky was red in the east, and soon the sun would rise in all its glory, bringing with it a new day. Her heart beating faster than usual, Lulinda tried to sit up, but found to her great astonishment that she was securely bound hand and foot—and so was Chikongo, who was still fast asleep beside her. Nor was that all . . .

Standing around them in a semicircle were six of the fantastic pink men whom the dead boy Mulumbi had seen and now they were in full battle dress. Tall and handsome in an unimaginably alien and fantastic way, the terrible Strange Ones towered above the frightened girl and her sleeping partner like colossal statues of pink flesh and shining bronze armour.

Each of them now wore a cuirass of heavy bronze scales and a helmet with one or three crests and what was obviously the hair of some animal. Two of them wore shining bronze leggings, and all of them carried shields either of leather studded with iron or bronze, or of iron with bronze bosses. All carried heavy iron-headed spears and all wore at their sides what were obviously deadly swords.

"Now I am dead," thought Lulinda. "Now we are both as good as dead." It was just then that Chikongo woke up and an expression of great surprise spread across his face. His mouth dropped open and his eyes widened. He looked as surprised as a fish that had just discovered its parents were a frog and a lizard!

The Strange Ones roared with laughter at this and Lulinda was astonished to discover just how human their laughter was, and how warm and genuine it sounded. This was not the hollow laughter of Evil Spirits, but that of very amused men, differing in colour, features, hair and form of dress from Chikongo's and Lulinda's race—yes, but human beings none the less. Then the one who seemed to be the leader of the Strange Ones put a question to Chikongo in a strange language that reminded Lulinda of a clear stream murmuring in the cool depths of a forest.

But they could not understand one another and eventually the voices of the red-headed Strange One and Chikongo became aggressive in tone.

It was the youngest of the Strange Ones who saved the situation. He came forward and looked down at Lulinda and beckoned her to look at him, which she at last managed to do. He pointed to himself, then to his companions—and then he pointed to his own mouth and stomach. Then, from his leather pouch he took out a piece of meat and glared at it in a most menacing way, bit off a piece and then spat it out in great disgust. Again he pointed to himself and the rest of his companions, then eastward once more. He then counted his fingers and toes and raised his hands with all fingers extended to indicate “ten times twenty”.

A smile budded and burst into flower on Lulinda's lovely face and she nodded vigorously to show she understood. Then the brown-haired, blue-eyed Strange One counted fifty times on his fingers. He indicated on his bronze-scaled chest the breasts of a female and he counted twenty-three on his fingers and made a gesture showing ‘little person’. Again Lulinda smiled and nodded rapidly.

“What are you both here grinning about?” Chikongo demanded. “You seem to be getting quite friendly with this dangerous beast, Lulinda.”

“I understand what they want; he says there are two hundred of them in the east down the river and fifty of them are females and twenty-three of them are children. He says they are tired of eating meat and are hungry for other food. I think they are human beings of a sort—I am quite sure they are human.”

“Listen, Lulinda,” growled Chikongo, “these things here are no more human than I am the son of a web-footed rhinoceros with seven tails. I am positive they are some form of evil spirit come to destroy our people. Do not let them get you under their spell.”

“Do not bother your great and all-knowing brain on my account, beloved one," smiled Lulinda. "The only spell I have fallen under is the spell of understanding. I think we should take these people to our Chief Chungwe."

"You mean you should take these people to him, Oh pleasure of my veins," smiled Chikongo. "You forget that if I go with you, people will start asking a lot of embarrassing questions, my love. They will want to know just what we were doing in the forest at night to begin with and, as you know, our tribe has a very unpleasant way of dealing with boys and girls who commit adultery and I have no wish to be shorn of my manhood and flung to the nearest crocodile, you know."

"I know," said Lulinda. "I do not need you to remind me of that."

Meanwhile the Strange Ones were also engaged in animated conversation amongst themselves, a conversation in which the giant red-bearded leader and the brown-haired youth talked loudest. Once or twice the tall red giant took a step forward and half-drew his sword, snarling threateningly at the younger man, who only threw up his arms and laughed impudently at the infuriated giant.

At last the red-bearded one seem to yield to whatever the young man had suggested and it was not long before the bonds on Lulinda's and Chikongo's wrists and ankles were cut. Then the brown-haired blue-eyed one cocked his curly head to one side and looked questioningly at her. She and Chikongo led the way through the forest towards the village of Lumbedu the witchdoctor.

It was one of the strangest and most fantastic processions of all time that wound its way through the great forest that morning. First came Lulinda, walking proudly in front. Then came Chikongo, whose nerves seemed to grow more and more taut with each step. Beads of perspiration stood out on his forehead like morning dew on a leaf, and he was as tense and as agitated as a kudu bull which has just caught the faint scent of a marauding lion.

Behind him came the shining company of the Strange Ones—twenty in all, some of whom had been in the other huts of the village during the long discussion between the Strange Ones and Lulinda. Their tall crested helmets hid half of their finely carved features, except their eyes, noses, firm thin-lipped mouths and square chins. Only three of them wore beards, besides the heavily armoured full-bearded giant who was their leader. They moved through the forest like a serpent of living, shimmering bronze, each as alert as an angry lion, cold deep-set eyes scanning the forest with the lofty contemptuousness of gods—as if they were ready for anything that might try to attack them, and all too happy to strike it down.

There was one man in which Lulinda and Chikongo had become very interested indeed; this was the one at the very end of the glittering line of armed men. He obviously belonged to a race totally different from the Strange Ones, whom he resembled only very slightly. His skin was much darker and even his dress was totally different from that of his companions.

While the Strange Ones wore under their armour short tunics of what looked like cloth, this man wore nothing save a green and black striped loin-cloth. While the Strange Ones had long flowing hair, this man's head was clean-shaven and he wore a tight-fitting green leather cap on his head. He was totally unarmed; the only item he carried was a big leather bag containing rolls of what seemed like calfskin, small clay jars of medicine of different colours, ranging from white to deep blue. He also carried many pointed reeds and strange sticks with tiny tufts of animal hair at one end. This odd man walked with a slow step and an expression of unfathomable bitterness on his face and Lulinda wondered about him greatly; was he one of the Strange Ones or was he a captive, or slave? But she was to find out very soon.

Lulinda saw the village of Lumbedu in the distance, sitting like a circular scar on the domed forehead of an ancient hill. Chikongo, who had also seen the kraal at the same time, drew Lulinda to him, swiftly kissed her forehead and nose, and vanished in the forest. But the two young culprits knew nothing of the fact that a pair of eyes had seen them from the bush, the eyes of the last person on earth whom Lulinda would have wanted to discover her secret love affair. They were the eyes of Ojoyo, the First Wife of Lumbedu no less, and that boded ill for the lovers.

Lumbedu, the witchdoctor, was lying on a pile of leopard skins in his hut, pretending as usual to be very sick. He groaned and whined and writhed whenever one of his many wives entered his hut, but laughed and chortled and patted his greasy stomach when he was alone. It was while his Third Wife, Vunakwe, was holding a bowl of milk to his spatulate and blubbery lips that Ojoyo's strident voice crashed through the hut, edged with great fear and urgency.

"Hide the children; take them out of the kraal into the forest. Lulinda is coming—she is bringing the Strange Ones with her," she cried. "The Strange Ones are coming!"

Tumult, and confusion twice confused, burst like a violet poisonous flower through the kraal; screams, bawls, shrieks and the yapping of dogs tore the astonished skies apart. Women and howling children ran hither and thither like frightened goats among the huts. The fat ebony-black Second Wife, Taundi, grew so wild with fear that she threw her youngest child into a great bowl of ground corn and ran squealing fatly out of the kraal. She ran like a woman gone mad, down the hill and straight into Lulinda and her glittering companions.

The astonished Strange Ones saw a black mountain of a woman come tearing down the footpath and then leap high into the air with an unearthly, smothered shriek, and fall like a great female hippopotamus into a very prickly thornbush, as unconscious as the dreams of yester-year.

Lulinda paused and placed her small hand on her unconscious rival's fat chest. On finding her alive, she beckoned to her foreign companions to follow her. As they passed into the distance, Taundi slowly recovered consciousness and staggered to her feet, to start running again, faster than before, farther away from her husband's kraal, deeper and deeper into the dark forest.

Midday found her still running, sobbing hoarsely and bathed in sweat—but still running. She ran until she burst through into a clearing in the centre of which stood a village whose gate and stockade were lavishly decorated with human skulls, ribs and thigh-bones. Taundi recognised the village as that of Dimo, the Dreaded One, King of the Cannibals. With a loud scream she turned and stumbled into the forest, but it was too late.

A crowd of slim and very beautiful female cannibals came running out of the village with Dimo himself bringing up the rear. With loud squeaks and giggles of unspeakable joy they chased the panic-stricken Taundi through the forest until she dropped from sheer exhaustion. They seized her and frog-marched her back into the village with loud shrieks of laughter. They took her to a roofless hut where three great pots were already filled with water at the boil.

The last thing Taundi saw on this earth was an incredibly beautiful young cannibal woman with filed teeth and heavy copper ornaments that blazed in the sun. A wicked-looking copper knife was clutched in the young cannibal's small hand.

"We see you, oh breakfast," said the cannibal girl quite sweetly. "We see you and are thankful for your having come to feed us."

* * * * *

Lulinda entered Lumbedu's silent kraal with the Strange Ones close behind her. She raised her voice and called out, but nobody came. Then she began a systematic search through the kraal, finding nothing but broken pots and calabashes, spilt sourmilk and a sick dog lying behind a hut. She was about to give up her search when a muffled sneeze exploded within one of the great round sisulu granaries. She looked into the basket and there, crouching fat and monstrous and terribly afraid, was the great witchdoctor himself, bathed in sweat and quaking like a bowlful of sour porridge. "Don't tell them," he whispered. "Please don't tell them I'm here!"

Like the disloyal and disobedient wife she was, Lulinda went to the gate of the kraal and beckoned to the Strange Ones to follow her. She calmly indicated the basket in which her fat lord was hiding. Lumbedu let out a loud scream of fear as he saw three bronze helmeted and pink-faced heads looking down into his basket. He uttered a loud scream as the basket was hacked to pieces by the giant leader of the Strange Ones, who then sheathed his big sword and hauled Lumbedu out by one arm.

Lumbedu wetted his loinskin and the Strange Ones roared with laughter. While the red-bearded giant and the brown-haired young man held the quaking witchdoctor forcibly erect, Lulinda explained the situation to him and when she had finished the young Strange One turned and snapped a few words to the odd man with the green striped loincloth and skull cap and concluded by kicking him soundly in the buttocks.

The odd man picked himself up out of the dust and sat down on one of Ojoyo's grindstones. He then opened his bag and, spreading its contents on the ground before him, he selected one of the rolled sheets of what looked like calfskin and one of his pointed reeds. This reed he dipped into a small jar containing a black fluid and began tracing patterns and what looked like human figures on the roll of skin. Before the astonished eyes of Lumbedu and Lulinda, the odd man was making a long series of drawings on the calfskin roll—he was telling the story of the Strange Ones. He was telling in clear, unmistakable and beautiful pictures why the Strange Ones left their country and came to the Country of the Black Men.

First he showed a savage battle between the Strange Ones and another race with long flowing beards and hair. Then he showed the Strange Ones being routed in a charge by foot soldiers and warriors riding on fantastic vehicles drawn by strange beasts with long flowing tails and manes, like zebras without stripes. After this he showed a number of canoes with long poles in the middle and he drew figures representing the Strange Ones fleeing towards these canoes in wild panic.

He showed the males of the Strange Ones fighting a brave rearguard battle while figures, obviously female and young, clambered aboard the canoes. The canoes were then represented in full sail over what was obviously water with fish and crabs swimming below the surface. He drew a circle representing the sun and made a hundred strokes under it.

"A hundred days," breathed Lulinda.

Silently, ignoring the interruption, the odd man showed battles between Strange Ones and wild beasts, lions and elephants and leopards, battles that the Strange Ones, with their superior metal weapons always won. He dropped the now full calfskin and took out a second one.

Lulinda screamed when the odd man finished the first picture on the second sheet. The picture showed two black figures, male and female, embracing under a full moon near an old and dilapidated cluster of huts, and those two figures represented Chikongo and herself.

Unknowingly, unwittingly, the odd man was betraying Lulinda to Lumbedu, her husband. And soon, on the silent sheet of calfskin, the whole nocturnal adventure was exposed, up to the time when Chikongo kissed Lulinda for the last time and fled into the forest. There, on the silent parchment, the trembling Lumbedu not only read the story of the Strange Ones, but also that of Lulinda and her secret partner. All was set out in clear lines and many colours as plain as daylight. The adulterous love affair of his youngest and favourite wife stood out for all to see.

The odd man then started to explain in pictures that the Strange Ones were more than willing to trade some of their weapons for any foodstuffs, except meat. Then, after that, the red-bearded leader and the younger brown-haired man dropped Lumbedu contemptuously on the ground and started, together with the other Strange Ones, carrying off some of Lumbedu's full corn baskets. But for every basket they took they left a spear, an axe, or a knife behind—all superb weapons of gleaming steel or bronze.

While this was going on, Lulinda saw the odd man with the green striped loincloth leap over Lumbedu's kraal stockade with two stolen swords in his hand and vanish into the forest.

The Strange Ones left after drinking every drop of milk in the kraal and after the ever-smiling young man with the brown hair had stood over the prostrate and still badly scared Lumbedu taunting him cruelly in sign language for his great cowardice. It became plain to Lulinda that the Strange Ones had not yet noticed the odd man's escape.

* * * * *

Ojoyo and the rest of Lumbedu's wives and children did not return to the kraal until well after sunset. They found Lumbedu staring in blank fascination at the pile of weapons the Strange Ones had left in exchange for the corn. The first thing Ojoyo did on coming into the kraal was to root out Lulinda and call her an adultress to her face, describing in vivid language how she had seen her being kissed by Chikongo in the forest.

Lumbedu was still suffering from the after-effects of his great fright and could not think or talk straight, so his wives took the law into their own hands and bound Lulinda securely hand and foot in preparation for her ceremonial execution on the day to follow. They beat the helpless woman with their skin skirts, burned her thighs with hot stones, spat on her and blew their noses at her.

They seized her breasts and pulled them until she shrieked with pain and, before they left her, they forced her to drink the entire contents from Lumbedu's clay urinal.

They were not being cruel; they were only doing exactly what the law and the customs of the tribes of the Dark Land say should be done to adultresses before they are executed. Then on the following morning, Ojoyo sent her eldest son Gumbu to the kraal of the Tribal Avengers with the request for the arrest of Chikongo as an adulterer.

Now, the Tribal Avengers were a group of men over whom no chief had any power and who had no tribal loyalty. They were men dedicated to the destruction of all those who broke tribal customs and, being members of no particular tribe, their assistance could be enlisted by anybody from any tribe. Even the chiefs lived in fear of the fanatically dedicated Avengers and many, in our land's strange history, are the chiefs who fell victims to the spears of this secret group of men who had chosen to be shorn of their powers of fatherhood and who could kill a woman with the same pitilessness with which they killed a man.

They led loveless, joyless lives, these strange men, living only for the enforcement of the centuries-old customs of the Black Race. Very often nobody knew just who they were because they always wore heavy woven bark masks whenever they emerged from their isolated kraal during daytime.

Thus it was that by midday on that cloudy day, a strange figure was seen coming up the hill on which Mburu's tiny kraal was perched like a lost bird on a rock. Mburu was the father of Chikongo, who was an only son amongst many daughters.

"Look, what is that coming up the path?" said one of the girls to Manjanja, the First Wife.

Manjanja's eyes were fast losing their sight although she was only four-and-forty years old, and they groped blindly in an effort to see what the girl was pointing at. "I see nothing, child," she said. "Tell me what you see."

"It is a man, but he is wearing a chinyau mask on his head and he is clothed from ankle to neck in leopard skin. He is carrying in one hand a big club shaped like a man, a carved club with a big head and ugly face. He has an axe that looks terrible."

The half-blind woman leapt to her feet with a choking cry; she knew very well who and what the masked man was. She called urgently for her husband and to Chwenyana, the Second Wife.

"Oh my fathers," cried Mburu, "an Avenger!" The Tribal Avenger paused outside Mburu's kraal and called out harshly: "You in there . . . you Mburu, the son of Timburu, the son of Chumba, son of Kondo . . . come out and stand outside the gate of your kraal, which I will not defile my feet by entering. Come on out and hear what I have to say."

Mburu came out, a proud, brave man who had once been a leopard hunter until a leopard mauled his right arm, paralysing it forever. He stood facing the dreaded Avenger without fear and without expression on his strong, bearded face.

"Speak, Avenger, I listen."

"Your miserable son, who I shall not defile my mouth by mentioning by name," said the Avenger, "has slept more than once with one Lulinda, who is the youngest of the females of one Lumbedu who pretends to be a witchdoctor. Your wretched son knew very well what he was doing and he knew that stealing another man's love-mat from under him is a breach of custom, punishable by any kind of slow death that the insulted man may choose for the offender. And since Lumbedu has spent a complaint to us, we are positive that your son is guilty and we have already sentenced him to death. So your son is now bound by law to go to Lumbedu's kraal and receive the death he so richly deserves. Do you have any questions to ask?"

"No, Avenger, we have none," Mburu replied, choking back a sob. "If you say my son is guilty then he is guilty."

"Now I shall make a trail of cowrie shells from here to Lumbedu's kraal," said the Avenger, "and your son must come out naked and follow that trail—he must be at Lumbedu's kraal before sunset, and he must be dead by evening."

As Chikongo dropped his loinskin and took leave of his parents, his mother Manjanja clung desperately to him, her only son, crying bitterly and saying: "Oh, Oh light of my fading eyes, my child, why . . . why did you do it?"

"I do not know, mother," whispered Chikongo. "Goodbye now, mother."

"My son," said his father, "do not be afraid. Just show that fat bloated dog of a Lumbedu how Timburu's grandson can die. Die like a warrior, my son; die with a smile on your lips as your warrior grandfather died."

As Chikongo took the last cowrie-strewn journey of his young life, Mburu drew his weeping wives into his hut and took an Oath of Vengeance in which he swore to kill the witchdoctor Lumbedu one day, even if it took him years of waiting.

* * * * *

It was in the afternoon when Chikongo came through the gate of Lumbedu's kraal and to his own great surprise he felt utterly unafraid; in fact, he felt very angry and actually wanted to die. As he entered the kraal he saw Ojoyo and the rest of Lumbedu's wives standing in a scowling semicircle, leering, with bone or copper knives in their hands. Beyond them he saw the tall Avenger standing with folded arms next to Lumbedu and his son Gumbu, who was now armed with one of the metal spears the Strange Ones had left.

"Come on, you foul bitches," cried Chikongo. "Come on and get it over with?"

"No, my boy," said Ojoyo, with a nasty smile, "we shall come on, but we shall not get it over with in a hurry. You shall suffer a lot before you die. I would like to hear you scream for mercy before we despatch you."

"You shall never make me whine, you dirty slut," snarled Chikongo. "I am not your husband who squeals like a pig when you so much as point a finger at him. Come on, do your worst."

And do their worst they did. But never once did the brave young man cry out, even when his entire lower abdomen had become one bloody mess of spurting blood and tattered flesh. They held him down, but he never so much as attempted to struggle and at long last he opened his mouth and gave one long shuddering gasp.

"Now you are going to squeal, my bush-pig. Come on, let us hear you squeal," Ojoyo cried.

"No, you foul she-hyæna," gasped Chikongo. "I shall not cry out. But I am feeling very sorry for you all. Today you kill me, but tomorrow, or a few moons from now, you . . . you too shall be dying. You have fallen like trapped flies into the web of Death and soon he shall come and consume you all."

With that, the son of Mburu, son of Timburu, died. He died as his valiant father had told him to die; he died as his grandfather Timburu had died so long ago—bravely, without a murmur.

"He cursed us . . . he cursed us with his last breath," sobbed Vunakwe, who had taken no part in the ghastly execution. "We are all cursed."

"Be silent, you weak-bellied bitch," snarled Ojoyo. "Some of you bring out Lulinda quickly.

Lulinda was dragged out of her hut and flung brutally upon her dead lover's body and all eyes turned towards the tall masked form of the Tribal Avenger for further instructions.

"Did you make the raft?" snapped the Tribal Avenger to Gumbu, the son of Lumbedu.

"Yes, Mighty One, we did."

"Then drag this adulteress and this dead dog out of here to the riverside and tie them together face to face. Roll them on to the raft and tie them firmly to it. Then push the raft into the river—the scaly crocodiles shall deal with both dead and living. I have spoken."

* * * * *

How long Lulinda drifted down the Zambezi she did not know; it seemed like æons and æons. Her body was numb and her brain was fast approaching the valley of madness. She kept her eyes tightly shut all the time because whenever she opened them she stared into the wide-open eyes of her dead Chikongo. The cruel leather thongs that tied her to the raft were biting into her flesh like red-hot copper knives, and the wake of blood—Chikongo's blood—that the raft was leaving behind, was attracting whole tribes of ravaging crocodiles. Something huge, scaly and long-snouted clambered on to the raft and fastened its teeth on the dead man's leg, towing the raft nearer to the south bank of the river. But just when Lulinda had given herself up for dead, she saw a canoe creep into her limited field of vision, a canoe that turned its prow and bore down upon her raft and the swarming crocodiles clustering about it. Lulinda saw that there was only one man in the canoe—she could see him clearly silhouetted against the last glow of the dying sun.

The darting canoe rammed the raft and tore it out of the crowd of crocodiles swimming around it. Then Lulinda felt a weapon of unbelievable sharpness cutting her bonds to pieces. She felt strong hands snatch her out of the very jaws of a crocodile. She had a glimpse of a smiling thin-lipped mouth, a straight nose and a pair of bright black eyes. She saw a face handsome in a strange alien way—a face she had seen before. It was the face of the odd man who had escaped from the Strange Ones at Lumbedu's kraal. Lulinda passed into the vale of unconsciousness in the arms of the light brown-skinned foreigner.

* * * * *

The legends say the odd man took Lulinda away to the safety of the great forests in the south of what was in later years to be known as the land of the Varozwi people. There the odd man gathered all the small tribes and clans and welded them into one mighty tribe to which he tried to impart some of the arts and the knowledge of his faraway native land. Even today the tribe this tawny-skinned foreigner founded is known throughout the land of the Black Tribes as the only one that practises the strange art of fortune-telling by gazing at the stars. The Varozwi is the only tribe practising mummification of its chiefs. Before a young Varozwi prince can assume the headdress and kaross of chief, he is forced to spend four nights in a cave in which are the mummified bodies of his father and ancestors. He must pray to each of these desiccated corpses for strength and wisdom and demand from each a blessing and a spiritual light to show him the road of life.

But, apart from the fact that the odd man founded the Varozwi Tribe, no clear details of his adventures and eventual death have reached us from across the gulf of time and his is one of the few stories in the land of the tribes where the story-teller must speak but a few words and be silent, because there is no more left to tell, for Time, that devouring monster, has devoured the rest.

* * * * *

Gumbu, the rascally son of a rascally father, knelt before his fat parents Lumbedu and Ojoyo and gave them advice—advice that was to affect thousands of lives and change the history of the whole southern part of the land of the tribes; advice that was to lead Lumbedu along the downward path to the valley of undoing and a miserable death.

Gumbu told his parents that since they were the only people who knew what the Strange Ones wanted, they should be the only people to trade big baskets full of corn, yams and pots full of milk for the superior iron and bronze weapons of the Strange Ones. With these weapons, Lumbedu could easily seize power and rule the whole land as a High Chief. Gumbu pointed out with jackal-like cunning that a few men armed with these metal weapons could easily rout a whole army armed with bone-tipped spears and stone axes, as was the case with all the armies of the tribal chiefs at this time. It must be remembered that at this time the only metal that Black people knew was copper, with which they made ornaments and knives for stabbing only.

The selfish, ambitious old charlatan Lumbedu fell down on his hands and knees and actually kissed his son's feet like a beggarly slave for the suggestion he had made and the next few days saw a brisk trade between Lumbedu and the ships of the Strange Ones, which came crawling like many-legged sea serpents up the Zambezi river. Lumbedu's wives and daughters would put full baskets of corn or yams in a particular place on the bank of the Zambezi and then beat a tattoo on a big drum before retiring into the forest. The ship of the Strange Ones would then edge nearer to the bank and its occupants would pick up the baskets, leaving a pile of spears in exchange. Within five days, the witchdoctor had enough weapons to arm close to two hundred men and it was then that Gumbu gathered together a small army of ruffianly cut-throats and armed them with the deadly metal spears and swords. In one short, savage battle he overthrew the High Chief of the land, Chungwe, and slew him on the doorstep of his own Royal Hut.

Lumbedu became a High Chief in one day. The gross, whining and utterly selfish wretch suddenly found himself waddling like an overfed vulture at the head of twenty thousand subjects and the heady fumes of the mead of power and ambition made him drunk as yesterday's nightmare. He wanted to conquer until he ruled the whole world and traded and pleaded with the Strange Ones for more weapons and still more.

His wild, undisciplined armies tore like wildfire across the shocked land and chief after chief fell before the new weapons of metal, and tribe after tribe was enslaved. Gumbu's savage hordes swept southward into the land of the ancient people known as the Ba-Tswana who, blessed by the Great Spirit itself centuries earlier, had been living in peace for generations. Here, in this land, Gumbu demanded that the defeated tribal chief, Mulaba, should give him his daughter Temana as a wife and as a hostage, and he took this lovely maiden back home with him to Lumbedu's kraal after leaving governors to hold the land in his father's name.

On the way back, however, Gumbu was stricken by the eye disease called karkatchi and became totally blind in less than six weeks. Then one night Temana led the blind Gumbu to the very edge of a great cliff and pushed him over before leaping to her own death. The legends say that where Temana fell at the base of the cliff a cluster of tiny sweet-smelling red wild flowers soon grew, the origin of the letemana flowers which still grow there among the rocks till this day.

Meanwhile Lumbedu had become the undisputed chief of the biggest empire the tribes had ever seen—an empire that sprawled from the Inyangani mountains to the shores of the western ocean. What is so amusing about Lumbedu's empire and reign is that it lasted only one full year and eight moons.

* * * * *

While Lumbedu bathed in the sunshine of power and drank deep from his beer-pot; while his woman Ojoyo bedecked herself with hundreds of gleaming ornaments and had numerous slaves to obey her every wish and the land trembled at the mention of Lumbedu's name, a strange conference was taking place in the great grass village the Strange Ones had built for themselves at the mouth of the Zambezi river.

Four men sat around a wooden table inside a great four-cornered grass hut. One of these men was a tall bearded red-haired giant with the scars of many battles on his massive body and the other was an old man with long hair and a flowing beard that was as white as mountain snow. This old man wore broad circlets of gold, studded with precious stones, around his head and he wore a long tunic of purple cloth, over which he had thrown a flaming red cloak. The third man was of the same race as the odd man who had saved Lulinda and he had a white loincloth painted with strange and mysterious signs in red and black. On his head he wore a headdress of blue and red striped cloth and a yellow cobra reared menacingly above his forehead from the golden band around his head.

The fourth member of the council was a happy-looking brown-haired young man with blue eyes who entered the council hut long after the first three had been sitting. He had entered the hut with mischief dancing in his bright eyes and had then proceeded to make faces at the red-bearded giant before giving his big broken nose a playful tweak.

"You are late, my son," said the old Strange One.

"That I am, my father, is your fault. You gave me a wife at my tender age and now half my nights are without sleep. You see . . ."

"Be quiet, the King awaits your report and not details of what you do at night with your wife," roared the red-haired giant.

"My son," said the white-haired King gravely, "we are here to discuss a serious matter and not to jest. All we want to know is whether our plan is working properly—the plan of supplying the fat Lumbedu with weapons under the pretence of trade and then letting him conquer his own fellow people for us. We would like to know whether he is still unaware of our intent to come in once he has finished and to take over from him."

"Our plan is working well, beyond our wildest dreams, my father," said the young man. "Even now our bloated greasy friend has added yet another tribe to his empire and it will not be long before a great empire, with thousands of slaves, falls into our hands like ripe fruit."

"We cannot afford to wait much longer—we must strike now. Where we had a hundred separate tribes to conquer, we now have only one fat son of a vile hippopotamus to strike down and all his empire shall be in our hands," said the man with the loincloth.

"I agree," said the King. "We have waited far too long. Tonight we must attack that dog's village."

* * * * *

Lumbedu was feeling on top of the very stars, let alone on top of the world, and he was as happy as a starveling beggar's stomach which has just digested a stolen fowl. He was as happy as a lion with a million teeth and a thousand mouths.

Now if Lumbedu was as proud of his being a chief as a lion with many mouths, his First Wife Ojoyo was as proud of her suddenly finding herself a queen, as a vulture with many gizzards. Every morning she was carried in an elaborately carved litter to the riverside by a veritable bevy of beauties from her husband's harem and there she was bathed, smeared with crushed tambuti leaves all over until she smelt like a big fat sweet-scented flower. Then she was bedecked with copper necklaces and bracelets. She feasted all day long on wild honey, corn cakes, very fatty meat, and greasy yam stew.

She was shrill and cruel to the rest of the wives of Lumbedu and she could kill any one of them on the slightest provocation. She was, however, a woman with two guilty secrets lying heavy on her rotten soul and both these secrets would have earned her a slow and miserable death at the hands of the Tribal Avengers, had they become known. Firstly, she had poisoned the kind-hearted Vunakwe who had been Lumbedu's Second Wife and had buried her secretly in the hut where she, Ojoyo, always slept. And she had lied to Lumbedu by saying that Vunakwe had fallen into the Zambezi.

Secondly, Ojoyo had a secret lover whom she kept imprisoned in a cave in the forest and whom she always visited whenever the flame of desire burnt within her. This secret lover was a young boy of eighteen years and Ojoyo knew that seducing a person of that age who had not been initiated into adulthood according to custom was an offence punishable by death. No persons under twenty-five are allowed to so much as kiss, or be kissed by, members of the opposite sex.

Ojoyo had never asked her prisoner lover who his parents were and all she knew about the youth was that his name was Kadimo. Kadimo had been captured by Lumbedu's warriors while wandering aimlessly in the forest and, being a member of an unknown tribe, he had been brought into Lumbedu's kraal for questioning and execution. Kadimo, however, could not speak the language of Lumbedu's tribe and his only answer to the harsh questioning by the warriors as to the name and whereabouts of his tribe, had been nothing but a series of pathetic head-shakings. Ojoyo had suddenly felt herself drawn to the godlike youth Kadimo and had asked Lumbedu to give her the captive ostensibly for torture and killing, but in reality to imprison him in a cave and use him as a secret source of pleasure.

On the fateful day when the Strange Ones had finally decided to attack Lumbedu's village during the coming night, Lumbedu and Ojoyo had been feasting in their great hut from early morning to late afternoon. They had been celebrating twenty-five years of marriage according to tribal custom; they had eaten together a whole raw flamingo and then drunk a bowl of milk mixed with honey. They continued their gigantic feast with fowls and roasted meat washed down with potsfull of cornbeer—till they passed into the valley of unconsciousness together. Now nobody else in Lumbedu's kraal had been invited to this private feast, because only the man and his wife should be present during the ceremony of the "Eating of the Flamingo". The result of this was that, although Lumbedu and Ojoyo were lying drunk and insensible in their hut, everyone else in the Great Kraal was as sober as the morning breeze.

A man came running into the kraal at about midnight—he had been running through the forest for he knew not how long—and he had come to warn Lumbedu that the Strange Ones were advancing up the southern bank of the Zambezi in full force and that their intentions were definitely not friendly, as the now dead villagers whose headman this man had been, had found out. The man found sentries at the gate of Lumbedu's kraal and to them he whispered his story before he collapsed at their feet.

"I am the headman of the village of Lumoja—quickly, warn the High Chief that the Strange Ones are coming. They mean war—they have killed all the people in my village and will soon be here."

While two of the guards ran to warn everybody in the kraal, one stopped to help the fallen man to his feet. But he discovered that the man's back was covered in blood and that there was a long deep wound under his left shoulder-blade. Only sheer willpower and great courage had kept this brave man running for so long, while badly wounded.

Panic reigned supreme in Lumbedu's kraal that dark and star-spangled night. People fled naked out of the threatened kraal into the doubtful safety of the forests. Screams tore the night as some were pounced upon by leopards and night-hunting lions. Instead of standing and preparing to fight to the death in the kraal of their High Chief, the undisciplined and disloyal warriors of Lumbedu launched their fleet of battle canoes and escaped into the night carrying off Lumbedu's many wives and concubines with them to safety across the Zambezi.

Meanwhile Lumbedu and Ojoyo still lay in drunken stupor inside their hut where they had defied the best efforts of their subjects and children to wake them up. An hour before dawn something must have warned Ojoyo because she stirred uneasily and woke up. A few moments later she crawled out of the hut, urged by a strange sense of uneasiness that suddenly burst into flower in her soul. She called out to the night guards at the gate, but no one answered. The whole kraal was mysteriously deserted.

This stunning fact penetrated deep into Ojoyo's drunken brain and a terrible fear tore through her, leaving her as sober as the morning dew.

Then somewhere in the forest she heard the steady sounds of marching feet and the clash of metal on metal coming nearer and nearer. She sensed the murderous purpose behind those sounds and the dead man at the gate confirmed her worst suspicions. Ojoyo screamed in terror.

She ran back to the Royal hut and tried to waken Lumbedu by shaking him violently and calling his name repeatedly. But he only turned over on his back and snored louder than ever.

An alien war-cry shattered the starry night like a blow from a knobkierie as the Strange Ones burst into the kraal like a horde of mad bronze-clad demons from hell itself. Ojoyo crawled out of the Great Hut like a scalded snake and made her escape through one of the small emergency gates in the stockade, leaving the drunken Lumbedu to his fate.

First one and then the other of the two guard-huts flanking the gate burst into flame as the attackers set them on fire. Soon the whole lower portion of the kraal near the main gate was a mass of flames and redly glowing clouds of billowing smoke. The Strange Ones began to ransack the empty huts and to remove hundreds of sourmilk calabashes and dozens of baskets full of corn and yams. These they placed in the centre of the vast clearing before they set the huts on fire.

It was then that Lumbedu awoke and crawled drunkenly out of his hut and stood swaying on the raised clay doorstep.

"You . . . why are you burning my kraal?" he cried thickly.

A group of Strange Ones came running towards him, brandishing swords and gleaming bronze spears, but Lumbedu was far too intoxicated to be scared and stared blearily at them, standing his ground.

One of the Strange Ones aimed a sword blow at Lumbedu's head, a blow that was not intended to kill or to injure, but which passed harmlessly over his shiny bald pate. Lumbedu balled his fists and stood his ground, not even blinking.

One of the Strange Ones said to the King's brown-haired son: "Behold, how brave this fat barbarian is; he has chosen to remain behind while the rest of his people escape. I did not know these black pigs could be so brave."

Suddenly Lumbedu began to dance, urged by nothing less than the fumes of the strong beer he had drunk in such quantities. He stamped and capered like a mad gorilla up and down the firelit clearing in the centre of his burning kraal. He puffed and stamped and grunted and shook until his fat feet stirred up clouds of dust around them. Then, for a reason which even he could not understand, he snatched a spear from the hands of one of the astonished Strange Ones and ran himself through with it.

The young prince of the Strange Ones stood over the body of the dead

Lumbedu and for once he was not smiling. He shook his helmeted head and said: "He was a very brave man. He chose death instead of slavery—just as we would do."

"Let us take what we can and leave here," said the prince a while later. "I'm sure that my father will be pleased to hear that he is now the Emperor of a great land full of thousands of black, thieving dirty-skinned barbarians!"

* * * * *

The traitor Lumbedu who had played into the hands of the Strange Ones and had betrayed hundreds of thousands of his people into slavery, was dead, but of his woman, Ojoyo, a story remains to be told.

Ojoyo paused once in her wild flight through the forest and, looking behind her, saw the two huts near the main gate in flames. That blood-chilling sight caused yet another spurt of speed and she ran even faster than before. In the course of her flight she heard the sounds of a wild animal in the forest and stopped dead in her tracks with her heart in her mouth, until the beast had gone past. At last she came to a familiar stream which she knew flowed past the cave where she was keeping the youth Kadimo a prisoner. As the grey light of dawn touched the sky, Ojoyo found the well-worn path that led up to Kadimo's cave and followed it slowly and wearily as it twisted and turned past great rocks and boulders. As she approached the cave, a squat ugly figure detached itself from the rock behind which it had been hiding and barred her way

"Ho! Who you?" growled the ugly one. "You go back or you die."

"It is I, Ojoyo, my trustworthy Zozo," said she with a smile at the hunch-backed and unbelievably ugly idiot whom she had placed to guard the youth Kadimo day and night.

Zozo see you, Queen," said the idiot, dropping on his knee.

"Open the cave for me, Zozo, and then you can go into your own cave and sleep," Ojoyo commanded.

The powerful hunchback rolled aside the boulder that stood in the entrance of the cave and then fled into his own cave. Ojoyo entered the prison cave and felt around in the darkness for her youthful captive.

"Wake up, Kadimo," said she, "wake up, my love."

For a long time after that Ojoyo and Kadimo sat side by side in a dark recess of the cave conversing in low voices. Ojoyo told the youth about what had happened in Lumbedu's kraal that night and concluded by saying she feared Lumbedu had been killed.

"Now you . . . belong . . . Kadimo, . . . all his," said the youth who could by then speak a few words of the language of Ojoyo's tribe.

"Yes, Kadimo."

"When dawn comes, we . . . go away . . . back to my village. You come . . . back with me."

"And Zozo too?" asked Ojoyo.

"No, Kadimo hates Zozo . . . Kadimo wants Ojoyo . . . alone."

"As you say, Kadimo."

By midday of the day that followed Ojoyo and Kadimo were far away from the burnt-out kraal which Ojoyo had ruled with cruelty and insolence only the day before.

Ojoyo was beginning to become very afraid of Kadimo as his attitude rapidly changed from one of respect to insolence. He had now stopped calling her Queen and addressed her as "you". He even threatened to beat her up if she tried to sit down and rest. But the greatest surprise was yet to come.

"I'm tired, I want you to carry me on your back, you fat cow," he indicated in a broken tongue.

"Fat . . . fat cow!" gasped Ojoyo. "Did I hear you call me a fat cow?"

"Yes . . . you fat cow," said the youth. "Now bend down . . . and carry me."

"Never!"

Kadimo's great knobkierie thudded solidly against Ojoyo's royal ribs many times. She screamed and writhed and rolled on the ground as Kadimo gave her the greatest beating of her life. At long last the pain became such that Ojoyo began to whimper like a child and to beg Kadimo not to hit her again.

"Why are you so cruel to me?" she sobbed. "I am your Queen."

"You are my supper . . . you are my edible queen!"

"What, you mean that you are a cannibal!"

"I am Kadimo . . . son of Dimo . . . son of Sodimo . . . my father . . . King of the Cannibals."

"But you can't eat me, beloved one," pleaded Ojoyo. "I love you and I am still beautiful . . ."

"You . . . more beautiful . . . in stewpot. Tonight . . . we come to father's village. Come . . . carry me!"

How long Ojoyo carried the youth she did not know—it seemed like hundreds of years. When she stumbled and fell, throwing Kadimo, he always got up to beat her cruelly before getting on her back again. On and on she stumbled until the skies became as black as midnight and bolts of bluish lightning began to scourge the tortured heavens, while peal after peal of thunder shook the very roots of the earth. Kadimo prodded his human steed to the shelter of the forest where they found a small cave and in this cave Ojoyo found a chance to rest.

"Not far from . . . father's village. When arrive . . . Kadimo shall have . . . nice slice . . . for supper."

Kadimo . . . I beg you . . ."

But she got no further as a squat, hunchbacked and incredibly ugly shape burst into the cave and seized Kadimo by the ankle, dragging him outside into the howling rains. There was a short savage struggle, a loud gurgling scream and silence. Then the bowlegged and hunchbacked monstrosity called Zozo, who had trailed them relentlessly across the plains and through the forests, entered the cave.

"Zozo!" cried Ojoyo. "You saved me—he was going to eat me!"

"Yes, I saved you, but not for long. You knew Vunakwe?" asked the hunchback.

"Yes, I knew her very well; she fell into the Zambezi and . . ."

"You lie shamefully . . . you killed Vunakwe, and Zozo is Vunakwe's brother."

"Vunakwe had no brothers, I knew her father, her whole family."

"Father of Vunakwe . . . never owned that Zozo was his son, because Zozo a deformed thing. Zozo always lived alone. Now you die."

"No Zozo! You saved me . . ."

"Die Ojoyo!"

A copper knife stabbed down fiercely . . . once . . . twice . .

* * * * *

After Lumbedu's death the Strange Ones came out into the open and took over the astonished land. Soon hundreds of people began to feel the sting of the slave-driver's whip within the borders of their own native land. Dozens, scores of kraals and villages stood empty, their inhabitants having been forced into the Strange Ones' ships and taken away across the seas, never to be seen again.

The shocked land saw sights it had never seen before—long lines of men, women and children tied together with chains like living beads on a string, hauling sleds of stones the Strange Ones used to build great forts all over the land as far south as beyond the Herero. The shocked land also saw thousands of its black sons made to dig into the bowels of the earth like so many ants, to bring up iron ore, copper, and the yellow 'sun metal'. The Sacred Iron Mountain of Taba-Tsipi, or Taba-Zimbi, became a mass of tunnels in which tens of thousands of chained slaves worked and died.

Long trains of oxen and even tamed zebras began to wind their way eastward over mountains and across plains, heavily laden with gold, iron ore and ivory, to be loaded on to ships of the Strange Ones and taken across the sea.

Elephants and hippos—the animals hitherto regarded as sacred by nearly all the tribes—were butchered by the Strange Ones from one corner of the agonized land to the other, the elephants for their ivory and the hippos for their bones and blubber.

Many tribes fled from the wanton destruction and oppression of the Strange Ones and some of these tribes even reached that country which is now Swaziland.

Contrary to those who claim to know about the Black people, the Swazi people did not branch from the Nguni tribes that migrated into the lands south of the Limpopoma about eight hundred years ago. The Swazi and the Bomvana tribes came south of the Limpopoma much earlier than did the Nguni. When the Nguni came, they found the Swazi had degenerated to such an extent that they no longer built villages, but lived in trees like monkeys; hence the popular insult of "Tree Dwellers" the Nguni (from whom the Zulus sprang) applied to the Swazis.

The Swazis adopted the culture and even the language of the Nguni, which they speak with a hissing accent. They even adopted the weapons and the battle tactics of the Nguni. The Swazi are well known for their habit of wearing their hair very long and even dyeing it red with clay and wild root juices. They still imitate the long hair of those long-dead White men who invaded the Black land more than two thousand years ago.

The Strange Ones established great plantations near the Inyangani Mountains and here thousands of slaves also toiled, planting, hoeing and reaping corn and other crops which the Strange Ones had brought from their native lands. Even today, traces of these fantastic plantations that legends say were fertilised with hacked bits of bodies of dead slaves during winter, still survive for all to see and marvel at. These are known today as the terraced plantations of Inyanga. No Black people ever farmed in the terraced style.

In the course of time, more of the Strange Ones came to settle in the land, together with members of that hated race called the Arabi, which was to wreak so much havoc in our land in years that followed. Many of the Strange Ones took wives from the Lawu (Hottentots) and from the Batwa (Bushmen) races and many became the sons and daughters of Strange Ones and Yellow Ones.

Fifty years after Lumbedu's death the Strange Ones began to build many cities and villages in the land. But the biggest and most important city was on the shores of lake Makarikari—today a vast shallow salt pan.

This city was big enough to contain more than a thousand people, the legends say, and it was surrounded by a strong stockade of wood with stone towers at regular intervals. A deep ditch, filled with water went completely around the city, rendering it utterly impregnable to attack, and the only entry into the city was over a short wooden bridge across the ditch into a gateway. A great settlement sprang up around the city in the course of time as hundreds of traders, slave-raiders and ordinary settlers built their homes outside the city walls, and there raised their families.

The Strange Ones began to multiply in the land, although fever and all-too-frequent epidemics killed many of them. As a result of their trade with lands beyond the great waters, the Strange Ones amassed fantastic wealth in their homes and cities and they lived their lives in great luxury. Today, one still finds in the possession of Bantu witchdoctors incredibly old and rusted swords with bronze hilts, swords so old that their blades crumble at a light blow with a stone. There are unbelievably old ornaments of gold and silver and bronze—ornaments that are neither Bantu nor Arabi; worn, pitted and even distorted by age—ornaments that are today very jealously guarded by Tribal Historians and High Witchdoctors as the Secret Charms of the tribe. These ornaments are still used today in secret rituals and they still keep the memory of the Strange Ones fresh in Tribal Story-Tellers' minds.

As time went on, the empire of the Strange Ones, like all things based on murder, oppression and theft, began to take the downward path of decay. The number of ships that crawled up the mouth of the Zambezi began to lessen gradually and many of the sites where gold, iron and copper had been mined were abandoned and forgotten. Gradually the empire of the Strange Ones was isolated from the world outside and the Strange Ones turned more and more of their attention to making their lives as full of luxury and pleasure as possible. Soon the lives of each and everyone of them became one long orgy of song, dance, food and drink. They invented new and fantastic ways of entertainment. They had idols before which they performed orgies both revolting and utterly fantastic. The legends say that some of their queens and empresses began mating with beasts in attempts at finding new sources of carnal pleasure. Some even tried to mate their daughters to lions in an attempt at producing a new race of men who were supposed to combine the courage, endurance and ferocity of lions with the intelligence of human beings.

The legends also say that one of the Emperors of the Strange Ones had a young man for a Queen and he used to kill women, both of his own race and of the Bantu race, with great cruelty as entertainment.

It is said that the Emperors of the Strange Ones called themselves the "Children of the Star", because they claimed to have descended from a star that fell on earth, which took a young woman of the Strange Ones and had sons by her.

* * * * *

The next part of this strange story of the Strange Ones begins with the birth of a man called Mukanda, or Lumukanda, the Destroyer, who was destined to play a major role in the history of the Strange Ones. Lumukanda was born of slave parents in one of the filthy underground stalls where the slaves were kept in the great city on the shores of lake Makarikari.

He grew up a slave who knew no other kind of life except that of a slave. To him, as to all others born in slavery, the word freedom meant absolutely nothing and he lived only to be commanded and to obey. He was nothing but a puppet, dancing and capering at the commands of cruel masters.

By this time, the Black race between the Zambezi and Limpopoma rivers had been all but totally annihilated and the only free people there were the dead ones. At the time when the mighty hero Lumakanda was a youth of sixteen the empire of the Strange Ones was suddenly split violently into two as the result of a war between the White Emperors whose names have come down to us as Kadesi and Karesu. (These are not their true names; the Tribal Chroniclers have corrupted them in the course of time.)

When the story (which custom commands us to tell in Lumakanda's own words) commences, this war between the quarrelling foreign rulers had just ended in defeat and flight for Kadesi, and victory for the unnatural Karesu who had a male and not a female consort.

And so, my children, now begins the strangest story of all—the second sequel of our great Zima-Mbje Story, the grand epic that is still sung and chanted by many tribes even today, the undying story of the undying man who loved a goddess and who changed the destiny of an empire.

THE STORY OF LUMUKANDA

(THE WHISPERING NIGHT)

NIGHT had fallen, but the feasting in the house of the man who owned me went on without pause. The great hall was one blaze of light from the many torches burning steadily inside. The sounds of merriment were loud in my ears as I stood guard at the gate with my friend Lubo.

Many were the masters who came into the gate, but few were those who went out—and they left only because they were so full of good food and so drunk they could eat and drink no more.

Some left our owner's house on gilded stretchers carried by slaves because they had passed into the dark valleys of unconsciousness as a result of the vast quantities of beer and wine they had consumed. One of them came out in the most un-masterly fashion, being dragged out by the hair by no less a person than our owner's son, and flung head over heels down the clay steps of the great house into the dust. We learnt later that this worthy had been treated in such a fashion because he had heatedly told the owner of the house that rather than see the mad and unnatural Karesu ruling the Empire, he would have Kadesi on the throne. That was treasonable talk and Lubo and I agreed that the offending master had got off very lightly indeed.

The moon rose and its eerie light gave the white-painted houses of the great city a delicate, ghostly quality that had to be seen to be believed. Beyond the brooding stockades that guarded the city like a crocodile's jaws, the huge expanse of water that was Makarikari became one fantastic sheet of living silver. A few stars sparkled faintly in the heavens, fighting a losing battle against the grey soft light of the sacred orb of the night and the song of thousands of crickets was loud.

There were no thoughts of what the future held for me; I had no speculations over what was in store for me. I, and the rest of my shackled race, led our lives like the beasts of burden we were; it was of no use for us to speculate or to dream, because daydreams make a slave's life more intolerable than the chains around his ankles and neck.

A rasping voice rang out from the top of the steps behind us: "Lumukanda, the second slave, the master calls for you."

It was the old man, Obu, the first slave, who was in charge of all of us younger slaves in the master's house and grainfields. I turned and ran up the short flight of steps and then stood with bowed head just inside the door of the great hall. The masters and their females lay, or reclined, on gilded wooden couches along the three walls of the great high-roofed hall. Along the fourth wall, on either side of the door, stood cup-bearer slaves. Female slaves were carrying big baskets loaded with fruit, meat and corncakes, all ready to replenish the cup or the plate of any of the masters who might so wish.

There were small ivory-legged tables near each couch. On one stood the shining beer-cups while on the other stood the cake trays and meat plates. I could not help noticing that most of the masters now paid more attention to the beer cups than to the meat trays. The masters wore nothing save golden necklaces and bracelets, and white cloaks which they had only thrown around their waists because of the humidity. The females wore only light skirts and many golden bracelets and necklaces. A few even had broad golden bands around their heads. Their hair, ranging in colour from red to brown and to jet black, cascaded about their smooth shoulders like living smoke. Through the ringing of loud laughter and buzz of talking came my owner's voice from the far corner of the hall:

"You there, at the door, come to the middle of the hall."

"As you command, Master," I called out, drawing myself erect and stepping into the open space in the centre of the great hall.

"Look at him," roared my owner to the rest of the masters. "Look at that tall black brute—only sixteen and yet as tall as an adult and just as heavily muscled. I am willing to wager two big elephant tusks full of gold dust that none of your slaves can beat him in a sword fight."

"Taken," shrieked one of the others—a White woman. "I have a female slave who can tear that brute of yours to pieces!"

"What do you wager?" demanded a chorus of excited voices.

"Four cups of gold and two golden plates," snapped the black-haired female.

"Taken!" cried my owner. "Go and fetch your bitch and let us have a good fight tonight."

The woman snapped a command to one of her slave boys and he flew out of the hall into the night. Then my owner ordered a bronze helmet and a sword brought and given to me to arm myself with. The helmet was shaped like a human head and had a nose and two holes shaped like eyes; it covered my face completely. The sword was of iron with a bronze hilt and was both sharp and very heavy, with a needle-sharp point. It was the same sword I had used in six previous fights—fights between me and fellow slaves in which I always had the doubtful honour of being the winner.

"Fight well and win, second slave," roared my owner. "Fight well and win or, by the demons of hell, I shall cut your dirty black throat and fling your smelly carcass to the dogs!"

I drew myself up with pride and raised my sword high in salute. "I shall fight and win, Oh Master, I shall win as I have always won before."

"Insolent pig," hissed the White female whose slave I was due to fight. "We shall see about that."

Putting women fighters against men was one of the new ways of entertainment the Strange Ones had invented. But I had never had to fight a woman before and also, as I stood there waiting, a strange feeling of uneasiness began to grow within me—so much so that at one time I almost felt like dropping my sword and running out of the hall.

A few moments later, my tall female opponent came striding through the door wearing, like myself, a helmet and carrying a long sharp sword. Like me, too, she was naked save for a green loincloth around her broad womanly hips. She went to where her mistress lay on the couch like a glittering snake and prostrated herself in salute. Then she saluted everybody else in the hall by raising her sword.

"Fight," snapped her mistress. "Kill him, quick!"

Like a striking mamba, the fighting woman whirled upon me, her sword thrusting viciously at my stomach. But I sidestepped and the flashing sword only gave me a slight, though painful, cut in the side. Then I closed with her and our blades flashed and whirled in the torchlight, both of us fighting like the trained killers we were. Twice she wounded me with the darting point of her blade and twice I returned the compliment. For a while neither of us gained any advantage, then at last I forced her to give way by wounding her deeply in the thigh and above the left breast.

By this time the hall was in uproar, and none of the masters and their females was sitting any more; all were on their feet like so many bloodthirsty children and shouting encouragement to first one and then the other of us. Wagers flew back and forth and the owner of the female slave, stung to anger by my owner's vicious taunts, shrieked angrily that if I defeated her fighting woman, she would become my owner's wife for the night.

"Not for the night only," cried my owner. "Not for tonight only, but for ten more nights!"

"Yes," snarled the female, if your slave wins."

My adversary began to press me savagely now. She seemed anxious to end the fight as quickly as possible by killing me. Her sword was nothing less than a hissing silvery blur and only my skill saved me from being fatally wounded. Then at last I struck a blow at her that all but cut off her left breast. She fell with a loud cry of agony and my sword point entered her chest.

Loud cheers rang through the hall as I knelt down and removed her helmet to take to my owner as a trophy.

As I removed the helmet, the woman's agony-clouded eyes opened and a look of great puzzlement and surprise spread over her dark beautiful face. She was looking at something on my chest, the black, moonshaped birthmark that stands out against the dark-brown of my body. She could not see my helmet-masked face and she could not see the tears that came welling into my eyes as I recognised her. She was the woman whom I had known most intimately once upon a time—sixteen years ago when she carried me in her womb, brought me forth, and suckled me.

"It is your mother," whispered the old man Obu unnecessarily.

Sixteen years before, as a young girl, herself born in slavery, she had been mated to a young slave by the Slave Breeders, and had conceived and given birth to me. Like all slaves with suckling young, she had spent two years in the underground slave stalls where breeding took place, nursing her baby—me. After another year, when I was three, they took me away from her and I had never seen her again until this fateful night.

But she had not forgotten me and she particularly remembered the strange crescent-shaped birthmark on my chest, the birthmark that had excited the other slave mothers so many years ago.

Blind with tears I tore my helmet off and threw it to the floor. With great difficulty she opened her mouth and said: "My son . . . you are my son . . . Lumukanda!"

Forgive me, mother . . . Oh, forgive me . . ." I cried.

"Dear child," she said with a strange pitying smile, "I forgive you. You did not know—I could have killed you too. I am glad it is I, not you, who die.”

“Mother, don’t die, don’t die,” I cried.

Her eyes closed as I held her tightly, madly and desperately to my tear-bedewed chest. I looked up briefly to find that the hall was fast emptying of people. The masters were leaving in groups of threes and fours with their females, their laughter ringing loudly as they went into the moonlit night. My owner had already retired to his room with my mother’s mistress and soon only my friends, Lubo and Obu, were left with me in the silent hall. Then my parent’s eyes opened for the last time and once again she smiled. Her hand reached up and stroked my cheek briefly before dropping limply to the floor. Faintly she said: “My child, you . . . great deeds . . . someone great . . . loves you . Be brave . . . strong, my son . . .”

And with that strange smile of incredible tenderness and pride on her lips she died. I could have killed myself with grief, such as I have never known before—or since.

* * * * *

Obu, Lubo and I laid my slain parent to rest in a deep grave on the shores of the silvery lake. We buried her in the way the Strange Ones buried their dead, lying on her back with her hands at her sides. Her helmet was on her head and her sword was in its scabbard beside her tall body.

“Farewell, my parent . . .”

I could hardly stand, let alone walk, and Obu and Lubo had to support me as we went back into the moonlit city. As we approached the great gates, over the bridge spanning the deep water-filled ditch, a loud cry tore the quiet night and a body came hurtling down from the top of one of the great towers that flanked the city gate, plunging into the moat with an unbelievable splash—immediately sinking like a stone.

“Another murder,” cried Obu. “It is the second one in three days. What is this city coming to?”

“I know who that was who fell in there,” said Lubo. “It is the male wife of the High Emperor Karesu. Gods—great immortal gods, now there is going to be trouble!”

A harsh voice called out to us as we entered the gate, the voice of the leader of a troop of bronze-clad White guards who had come running to investigate the scream and the splash.

“Ho there, slave dogs. Halt! Who was that who fell into the moat? Answer!”

“We do not know, Master,” replied Obu, bowing low.

“What are you dogs doing outside the city walls this time of night?” snarled the commander of the guard.

“They went out to bury a dead fellow-slave, Commander,” replied one of the guards. “I saw them as they went out past the guard house.”

“Where did the one who uttered the cry fall from?” demanded the commander.

“He fell from the top of this tower, Master,” replied Obu, pointing to the tower on the left side of the gate.

“What race was he?”

"He was one of the master's, Master."

The guard commander turned to his men and shouted: "Some of you get up there quick. You, slaves, stay here and do not move."

The guards went pelting up the long flight of steps that went up the solid stone tower. Suddenly a white-clad figure came running down the steps of the other tower and flew like a mad ghost up the main street leading to the centre of the city. The commander, together with two of the guards who had remained behind, turned with a loud shout and gave chase.

"Come on, my sons," said Obu to Lubo and me, "let us get to our owner's home quickly. But do not run; these streets will soon be crawling with soldiers."

He was right; we were only a few blocks away from our owner's house when squads of fully armed soldiers came clanking past us on their way to the gate and alarm horns sounded in the silver night, calling all available warriors to man the towers and the stockade around the city.

"I wonder if they caught whoever it is that was running up the street," mused Obu.

"I would not like to be in his place, whoever it was," laughed Lubo, as he went up to the tall gates of our master's house.

Suddenly Lubo pointed excitedly to our right. "Look, look there."

"Where?" cried Obu.

"Over there, on the corner of the garden wall, look!"

We turned and, following his pointing finger, saw a sight that sent shivers of excitement along our spines. A tall white-clad figure had just climbed the high wall surrounding our owner's garden and was about to leap within.

"It is the fugitive who ran away from the tower," said Obu grimly. "Let us get into the garden quickly and seize him."

Like stalking wild cats we entered our owner's well-tended grounds and began our search for the white-clad fugitive whom we felt sure had pushed the male consort of our city's male Emperor into the moat. We all knew that if we let this fugitive hide himself in the gardens it would mean death for all of us and for our owner as well.

It fell to me to be the one who found the assassin, and a great surprise it was as well. I had gone well ahead of both Lubo and Obu when I heard people talking in low voices just round the corner of our owner's house. I dropped on my knees and crawled along the grass slowly and carefully until I could see around the corner of the great house. To my great surprise I saw the thickset, bearded man who owned us standing on the steps of the back door of the house and talking to the veiled white-clad figure of our quarry who stood on the ground looking up at him. I caught the last words of my owner's address to the fugitive.

". . . well indeed, but you must come into the house before someone sees you, your Highness."

"Your Highness . . ." The words struck me like a blow! Who, then, could the midnight fugitive and murderer be? In the whole of the empire there were now only two people left alive to whom the title of "Your Highness" could be applied. The first of them was, of course, the High Emperor himself; the other was his dead brother's widow whom I had never seen, but about whom I had heard a lot of fantastic rumours.

The visitor entered the house like a white ghost. Then came the next surprise of that memorable night. Loud shouting in three different voices erupted within our master's house and the voices were those of our owner himself, his son, and the woman who had been my mother's mistress. Then the blood-curdling sounds of a murderous sword fight, punctuated by the crash of breaking furniture, reached our shocked ears as we turned and ran to the front to get the long spears we carried when guarding our owner's house at night. A loud, quavering scream split the night air as we reached the front entrance. Then we heard the voice of my mother's former mistress shrieking loudly and accusingly:

"You killed him . . . you killed your own son, you foul murderer! But I am going out to tell the Emperor that you are plotting against him. You false traitor . . . you are trying to play a double game. I shall tell the soldiers you are hiding this bitch in your house!"

The door burst open and the woman came running out, wrapped in a blue cloak, with her hair flying behind her. Our owner was close behind her, bleeding from a cut above one eye. "To me, slaves, seize her . . . kill her . . . quick!"

(WHAT SECRETS HATH HEAVEN?)

For a few moments we hesitated as the female came running towards us. Then we sprang to obey our owner and barred her way just as she reached the gate.

Lubo pushed her violently and she stumbled backwards just as the master drew back his arm and threw his needle-sharp sword with all his might at her back. We heard the thud and the female fell backwards with the blade protruding from her bosom. "Your parent has been avenged, Oh Lumukanda," whispered Lubo in my ear.

Never before had I seen a night in which so much happened at the same time. Never before had I experienced a night that left so many memories in my mind. By the time we finished our task of burying the two dead Strange Ones and cleaning up the master's house, dawn was not far away and in fact, the eastern sky was beginning to lighten. Three very tired slaves descended the stone steps leading down to the underground stalls where other slaves were sleeping.

"Ka-whew!" said Lubo. "Oh my doddering father! What a night we have had!"

"Be quiet, my son, and sleep," said the old man Obu. "We shall soon have to get up, so try and get what sleep you can."

But I could not sleep and dawn found me tossing and writhing in the vermin-infested grass piled on the damp floor of my sleeping stall. My mind was in turmoil and I could not think straight. But uppermost in my seething, troubled mind was the realisation that I was guilty of the worst crime any man can ever commit—the murder of my own parent.

Pictures, clear and astonishingly real, flashed like thunderflashes through my troubled brain: pictures of my childhood and my mother as I remembered her then—the silly sounds she used to make when I cried. But I recalled most clearly the little toy she had made for me out of wood—a puppet I used to play with in my lonely hours. I cried and moaned in incurable agony and remorse. But I knew that no matter how long and how loud I cried I could never, never bring my parent back again. I knew with a terrible finality that whether I lived a short life or a long one, I would carry my guilt to the grave.

I cursed the masters, I cursed the gods and I cursed myself bitterly for what had happened. But always present in the back of my mind was the realisation that all this would never bring my parent back again. I suddenly found myself longing for death.

Morning came and we all crawled out of our sleeping stalls—twenty male and sixteen female slaves in all—and followed Obu to the lake for our morning wash. As I bathed in the living water one of the younger female slaves Luluma waded up to me and laid her small hand on my chest, asking: “How do you feel today, Oh Lumukanda?”

“I wish I were dead, Oh Luluma,” I replied. “I really wish I were dead.”

“Try and forget, Oh my brother-in-suffering,” said the girl soothingly. “It was not your fault—it was their fault.”

“I will never forget what happened last night for as long as I live,” I said. “No water on earth can ever wash my parent’s blood off these guilty hands.”

“Do not judge yourself, Oh Lumukanda. We are the playthings of fate and can never be responsible for all that we do or what happens to us any more than toys are responsible for what the playing child does with them.”

“The Old Ones tell us there are gods somewhere,” I said bitterly, “but I am afraid these so-called gods are but figments of some . . .”

“No, Lumukanda!” cried she. “Do not say that.”

“I shall say what I please,” I sneered. “If there are any gods, or if there is the Great Spirit, why in the name of all that is foul and rotten do they let such things happen to human beings? Why are we slaves and the Strange Ones our masters? Why is there so much misery, murder, theft and strife under the . . . sun? I dare any of those non-existent, imaginary, somnolent, gods-so-called to . . . to . . .”

“Lumukanda!” gasped the girl. “You are blaspheming. You might regret your words one day.”

And she was right.

After finishing our morning wash we followed the old man Obu into the master’s house to present ourselves and to do obeisance before him as was the custom amongst slaves. As we entered the master’s great hall we found him sitting on his great couch with his two young concubines, one on either side. But there was also someone else with them in the hall, someone who did not belong there at all—who was a total and unusual and frightening stranger. This was a tall, well-moulded beautiful woman whose skin was almost as dark as my own and who looked like the daughter of a Strange One and a Black woman. This woman wore a tight-fitting garment that reached from her midriff to her ankles. On her arms and forearms she wore heavy, broad and skilfully engraved gold bracelets while around her shoulders she wore a great white cloak made of a woven, shiny material. Around her head she wore a broad golden band and she looked at the world through a pair of deep-set glittering eyes with lashes as long as the first joint of a man's thumb.

I realised with a shock that she was the white-clad one whom we had seen the night before, climbing over the garden wall. So this was the sorceress—the feared witch Kadesi-Makira—the dreaded opponent of the Emperor Karesu!

From where she sat in the far corner of the hall she flayed us with her pitiless stare as we filed past our master and briefly prostrated ourselves before him and his concubines.

My turn came and I fell on my knees before our owner and crossed my forearms before my face as was the custom. Then I stood up and turned to go.

“Wait!”

That one single command stung the silent hall like a slave-trainer's whip-stroke and all eyes turned to the white-clad dark woman who had uttered it.

“Where did you get that slave?” she demanded of our master.

“Your Highness?”

“I asked you, where did you get that slave?”

“I bought him as a pup, Oh Great One,” he replied humbly. “Does your Highness know this slave from somewhere?”

“No,” said she grimly, “I have never seen the dog before in real life. But I do know what you must do to him immediately. Kill him!”

“Kill him, your Highness?” gasped my owner. “Pray why? He is my favourite fighting slave—he has won many prizes . . .”

“Fool . . . fool, what a fool you are!” cried Makira, rising to her feet. “Have you never heard of the prophecy about the Dark Destroyer?”

“The Dark Destroyer!” cried our owner, his eyes opening wide with horror and astonishment. “You mean . . .”

“Yes, my dear White fool, I mean that this slave of yours is none other than the Dark Destroyer whom the old prophets said would be born one day and would, like the vulture of sunset, destroy our empire,” the Queen Kadesi-Makira announced sharply. “Tell me, has he no strange birthmark somewhere shaped like some well-known thing?”

“He has!” cried one of the concubines. “A moonshaped mark above his left breast. I noticed it one day when he brought me some wine.”

“I dreamt about this creature last night. I dreamt of the Sun-God telling me he was in this very house!” cried Kadesi-Makira. “Seize him, you other slaves, seize him! Let me take a closer look at him before he dies. Seize him and bring him here!”

Obu and two other slaves seized my arms and pushed me towards the seated woman who rose and stared fixedly at me for a few moments and then lashed out with her open hand, hitting me hard on one side of the face.

“Ha!” she shrilled. “It has fallen to me to uncover the foul menace to our empire. We must kill this viper before its fangs can grow.”

They bound me securely hand and foot and they tied two heavy grind-stones to my ankles. Then they left me in my sleeping stall under heavy guard until the sun had set and night had crept upon the land like a stealthy panther. I knew that at last death would come and I would soon be with my dear mother. I felt happy and incredibly content. I joked with the slaves and with my owner. I told them to cook a nice dinner for me because I would be back tomorrow.

The slaves laughed but the witch Makira and my master were far from pleased. I had the satisfaction of seeing my owner turn pale.

They loaded me into a boat at dead of night and rowed to the centre of the great Makarikari lake. In the boat were Makira, our owner and his two concubines, and the four slaves who rowed the alien boat.

At a sign from Makira the slaves pulled in their oars and lifted me up and threw me into the water.

The cold dark water closed over me, smothering me. I felt myself sinking into the dark depths like a helpless stone, down . . . down . . . down . . . into the watery womb of the lake.

* * * * *

There were sounds in my ears and there was heat on my body. Slowly I opened my eyes and found myself looking into the blinding glare of the midday sun.

Quickly I closed my eyes and allowed my brain to work on this incredible fact: I was alive. But I had no right to be. I should be down there in the green depths of the water instead of lying somewhere on the northern shore of Lake Makarikari! I should be dead instead of hearing the song of the birds in the swamp trees and feeling the heat of the sun on my naked body.

"Lumukanda!" The strange silvery voice calling my name suddenly out of nowhere sounded exactly like my mother's. I felt a rush of incredible strength gush into my body as I leapt up and looked about me.

"Lumukanda!" It sounded from somewhere in the forest.

"Mother!" I cried. "I am coming, I am coming to you."

Now I was sure that I was dead, that I was not on earth but in the Spirit Land. I knew I was going to meet my parent soon and be happy for evermore. I ran wildly into the forest and the next thing I knew I was flat on my face in the mud, having tripped over a mangrove root. I sprang to my feet again, ruefully, and looked about. I was covered from head to foot in stinking mud and a voice laughed heartily from somewhere behind me.

"My parent," I cried, "please show yourself. Do not make me suffer; I have suffered enough as it is."

Suddenly my mother stood before me, smiling tenderly, with her sword in her hand and her metal headdress on her head. She stood there, tall and straight and very beautiful, and she smiled at me in a strange tender way—just as she smiled when she died. I leapt forward with my arms open to clasp my parent to my breast. My arms encircled her and I closed my eyes and wept, tears of pure heavenly joy that knows no description. But when I opened my eyes I found myself fiercely embracing nothing but a moss-covered mangrove tree.

The ringing laugh echoed through the forest again as I collapsed to my knees, sobbing bitterly.

I was going mad . . . I was mad. Someone or something was playing evil voodoo tricks upon me, trying to drive me into the valley of insanity. I must escape. I had to escape from that evil swampland . . .

I ran madly through the forest. Every tree, every rock seemed to have somehow grown a face—a face that opened its mouth and guffawed at me insanely. "Run, you murderer—matricidal slave, thief, beggar, run . . ." and there followed the laugh again, now distinctly maniacal.

How long I ran through that nightmare forest I do not know. But when at last the sun began to set I found myself lying flat on my face in a grassy glade utterly exhausted. My toes were bleeding from all the tripping and falling and I was caked all over with dried mud.

The grass rustled as something came towards me and I buried my face in my hands and moaned: "No, no, leave me alone."

But when at last I looked up I found it was only a stray impala which leapt gracefully and fled for its life when it saw me raise my head out of the long grass.

Some time later I found a small cave in the forest—a cave whose walls were covered with figures of men and animals painted not long before by the Batwa—the Little Yellow Ones. I cleaned out the abandoned cave and lay down inside to rest. I must have fallen asleep because when I awoke night had fallen long since and I was feeling terribly hungry and thirsty. Silently I crept to a nearby stream and drank my fill of the clear, cool water. Then I caught two frogs and ate both of them raw—having no means of making a fire—and finally returned to the cave where I made myself a bed of green leaves and laid down to sleep.

When I awoke it was nearly midday of the following day and I was feeling hungry enough to eat ten elephants. I left the cave and went down to the lake carefully avoiding the forest. A while later I found a game footpath leading to the lake. Here I dug two pit traps and covered them with grass and twigs, hoping to catch a buck or something for food. Then I proceeded to walk aimlessly along the lake to kill time and forget my hunger.

I had been walking for some time when I saw what I took to be an image made of shimmering silver, standing on a rock on the water's edge. It was shaped like a woman—tall and unbelievably well-moulded; it stood with its back to me and I was struck dumb by its utter perfection. It reminded me of those statues of alien gods which the Strange Ones had in their god-houses, or temples as they called them.

Because the Strange Ones had the habit of putting statues in the most unlikely places I was positive that this was also one of their works of metal art—probably a likeness of some imaginary water goddess.

But so perfect was the image that I was greatly tempted to have a closer look at it, and so I slowly approached it on the water's edge. Suddenly I became aware of a very strange thing: unseen waves of pulsating heat seemed to be radiating from the statue, becoming more intense as I went closer. Bolts of fear tore through my body and I turned and ran as fast as I could up the gentle incline away from the lake. When I felt sure I had put enough distance between the silver thing and myself I paused and looked back. An involuntary cry of horror and great fear was wrung from me by what I saw: The "statue" had turned and was now looking directly at me. Even as I watched it slowly began to walk in my direction and then it began to run. With a loud scream, I turned and fled, the mysterious thing in hot pursuit.

I ran along the marshy edge of the great lake, taking care to avoid the forest. But the thing was fast gaining on me. It came so close that I could see it had three heavy breasts, each with a shining green nipple . . . and its eyes were the colour of gold.

Wild with panic I swerved and dived headlong into the lake, swimming away as fast as I could. The thing stood waist deep in the reeds and I heard the ringing laughter I had heard before. Then, most gracefully it proceeded to swim in my direction and the radiance of its body left a trail of steam. What unearthly thing was it? It did not belong to this world—of that I was sure—and it was as out of place as a bird amongst the fish. Abruptly a voodoo voice reached my ears: “You had better give yourself up, human being, I will catch you eventually in any case.”

“What do you want to do with me?” I cried loudly as I increased the speed of my swimming.

The voice came back to me: “I am lonely and longing for companionship . . . I can stand it no more . . . I long for you . . .”

“No, no!” I cried. “What are you . . . what kind of creature are you?”

“I am a creature whose existence you have once denied. I am a goddess, and Ma is my name.”

This increased my terror and as she closed in on me I dived under in an endeavour to drown myself. But she hauled me out by my hair and dragged me back to the shore. We had a brief struggle in which I managed to free myself and I made a dash for the depths of the forest. After a while I noticed that I was not being followed. “I have shaken her off,” I quietly and happily mused by myself.

Cautiously I went to look at my two pit traps but found to my great disappointment that I had caught nothing. It was while I was staring in disgust at the second trap that I heard a rustling sound behind me. I froze with fright, took a step forward—and, with a savage curse, plunged into my own trap!

The tall, incredibly beautiful apparition of living silver stood looking down at me where I was lying on my back in the pit. A dazzling smile lit her face and she mused gently: “Oh my reluctant lover, most stupid and cowardly . . . do you make a habit of digging pit traps to catch yourself?”

“Aieeee!” I cried. “Go away and leave me alone, you unearthly monster.”

“You may not be aware of it, but you are equally unearthly, and in this world I have chosen you as my husband. But what an unfortunate bride I am! My new husband goes running like a madman and he even has the habit of setting traps for himself. Shall we now go to your cave and consummate our marriage?”

“Listen, you unnatural demon, go back to wherever you come from and leave me alone, do you hear? I am not your husband—I have never heard of such nonsense . . .”

“Now, now, now, who believes in demons? Did you not once tell a fellow slave that gods and demons are nothing but figments of the imagination? As far as you are concerned I do not exist. I am a figment of your imagination . . . is that not so?”

The apparition sat down on the edge of the pit, her feet dangling an arm’s length above my head. ‘Oh my great grandmother, can’t the thing go away . . . vanish like the unearthly phantom it is?’ I thought to myself.

“No, beloved one,” it said with a weary smile, “I cannot just vanish into thin air. In this world I am too real—and besides, far too much in love with you—simply to vanish and leave you alone.” I had forgotten that the thing could read my thoughts.

I was determined to stay in the pit to the end of time and the apparition, growing tired of my stubbornness, stood up and went away. I decided to wait till night came, so as to make my escape under the cover of darkness. But towards sunset she returned with a bundle of writhing mambas in her hands and coolly threw them into the pit in which I was still lying.

I do not know how I got out of the pit—all I know is that it was considerably faster than the way I got into it. “Let us go home, Oh my husband, there is much that we have to talk about.”

* * * * *

Outside, the night was alive with the sounds of animals of all kinds, from the faraway roar of lions to the lonely hooting of an owl in the tree at the mouth of the cave. Loudest was the croaking of frogs in the marshes on the edge of the lake. In the heavens above the stars shone like so many lost jewels against the dark expanse of the moonless sky. The Fire River, today called the Milky Way, was one broad band of smoky brilliance that stretched from one end of the heavens to the other, and a dethroned star streaked across it as it fell in disgrace.

I was now looking at creation with new eyes, and everything I looked at seemed to have assumed a new beauty—a new freshness. I had been listening to a very strange story: the story of creation—the story of how life came to this earth and the One who was telling me this story was none other than the Creator herself. She told me all about the First People, about Amarava and about Odu. I was feeling very small, a mere speck of living dust in a universe so utterly incredible.

“Great Mother,” I said at long last, “but what does one so great as you are want with a wretch like myself. I am hardly worthy of the love of a crawling louse.”

“Lumukanda, eternity is a vast and incredibly lonely Darkness—and even a goddess has to have someone in whom to confide at times, to escape from the futility which human beings have misnamed Life. I grow tired of roaming the Outer Darkness alone—deceived and rejected by my erstwhile spouse, the Tree of Life—a lost leaf in the Tempest of Eternity. I wish to make a comeback to earth and communicate with the human beings I have created. And I wish to do so through you, Lumukanda.”

“Goddess . . . I am not worthy of the honour!”

“Who is, Lumukanda, who is? Who in this mad, evil world is worthy of attention from me? None! But I had to choose someone, and that someone happens to be you.”

“A blood-stained matricide . . . a slayer of his own parent?”

“Yes, Lumukanda, a blood-stained parent-slayer. Because your deed has opened your eyes to the falsehood called Life—which is nothing but a lie and a failure from birth to death. You have experienced Life as but a horrid nightmare in which only pain, suffering and death are real. I have chosen you because you are one of the few human beings who have seen Life most closely for the useless, futile nothing that it is. I can see in you the kind who will never use anybody or anything to gain domination over fellow mortals—simply because you have grown to hate life and all its useless pleasures, its mock glories, the senseless futility of it all!”

“Goddess, how can you, who have brought Life on earth speak thus?”

“Listen Lumukanda, I did not create the Universe and the earth, and life upon it, out of my own free will. I obeyed the order of a Great Master who, for all that even I know, in turn has to obey the orders of even a Greater Master. The heavens conceal more secrets than even I can understand. Even I was told to do as instructed, and ask no questions.”

“Then what is the purpose of life on earth, Oh Great Goddess? Do I understand there is really none at all?”

“The only purpose of Life is Death. A man is born and before he dies he gets the opportunity to ensure that others after him will also be born and die. You may deceive yourself by thinking that there is more to life than birth, growth, mating, old age and death. But, sooner or later, Naked Truth makes itself apparent.”

“Naked Truth—like you, Oh my Goddess?” I said, in an attempt to change the subject.

“Look at the race of men whom you call the Strange Ones. See what trouble they went to, in coming to your country, seizing it, enslaving your people and despoiling themselves. What have they gained by it all? All they have gained is a useless toy called wealth—and softer couches on which to mate and die. They do not know it yet, but within a few moons you, Lumukanda, will go back there to lead a horde of savages, like yourself, to raze their plaything empire to the ground. And men born a mere hundred years from now will look in vain for traces of the Great City of the Empire of Karesu and Makira-Kadesi. You will leave no trace of it; turn it into a legend. Even thousands of years hence people must search in vain for the Lost City of Makarikari.

(BEHOLD THE DECEIVER)

IN the Great City of the Strange Ones there had been chaos and bloodshed. Piles of dead bodies choked the narrow streets. Blood had flowed like water as two opposing forces clashed like wild cats through the shocked city. But now there was peace and jubilation in the land, because the cruel one, the Emperor Karesu had been overthrown and captured in one short bloody revolt by the followers of the Empress Makira-Kadesi.

As night fell the city blazed with lights. The singing and noise rose higher and higher into the jewelled heavens even as the night deepened. Wild celebrations were in progress in the Great Palace and people crowded the gardens and the steps of the palace like flies on a pot of honey. Whenever the victorious witch-queen Kadesi made an appearance in the doorway of the Great House with her harp in her hand and her voice raised, singing their “song of victory”, loud cheers split the moonless night from thousands of throats: “Long live the Lioness, Makira! Long may she reign!”

The last time Makira made her appearance outside, before going back into the Great Hall to preside over the fantastic feast held in her honour, she held her hand up for silence and her voice was high and clear in the night: "Thank you, my loyal people; thank you for your support in wresting the throne from that madman Karesu who ruled you with such cruelty and with no regard for your feelings. Today I am your Queen, your Empress, and my greatest aim will be to raise this empire to heights undreamt of by its founders. This I shall do as soon as possible, and I know that I shall succeed. I shall reorganise our armies and I shall strengthen the walls around our cities and villages to make them invincible to any attack. I shall take this empire to the very stars, if need be—and this empire shall bloom like a flower and live forever in the minds of men—as the greatest of all time. Now, before I retire for the night, let us all sing the song of our country: 'Oh Flower in the Jungles Planted . . .'"

More than ten thousand voices burst into song and the Hymn of the Strange Ones reached against the starry skies. As the last verses, charged with arrogance and pride, "We shall fight and we shall conquer again, and yet again for you, Oh purple flower of the wilds," rang out through the roaring city, Makira burst into tears and wept unashamedly before her people.

The crowds were delirious; they went mad. And not one individual there but felt himself capable of crushing the very heavens for the Empress and the land. Such was the magic power that Makira had over her people—the Strange Ones.

Roar after roar of applause followed Makira as she turned and went into the Great Hall, now packed with nobles, battle-leaders and priests.

As Makira-Kadesi entered the glittering hall men and women stood up and met her paralysing stare, while slaves fell flat on their stomachs, prostrating themselves before her dreaded presence. In the heavy silence that followed, her voice rang through the hall:

"Let us feast, Oh my people, and let us be happy this great and memorable night. Let us make merry now, for tomorrow we have a lot of work to do. We shall work until we drop, to make this empire the greatest under the sun. We shall work to make this empire the strongest and the most invincible on earth. Tomorrow all of you who have more than ten slaves shall send half of them to our ore mines to extract metal for our weapons and gold for trade. We must make this city so strong that not even a mouse shall enter our city gates unseen. Let the feast begin."

The feast began; wine and beer flowed like water down the throats of the Strange Ones. Great quantities of meat and foods of all kinds were consumed to the magical sound of music. Dancing females and fighting slaves moved in and out.

The mystic notes of harp, flute and drum filled the gilded hall as toast after toast was drunk in honour of the Empress who sat alone in a corner with an untouched cup in her hand and a worried frown on her face. Suddenly she rose and, in a tempestuous rage, hurled the wine cup at the face of the nearest slave and drew her dagger from its sheath. She proceeded to dance—a wild, savage dance nobody had seen before, flourishing the dagger above her head like a bloodthirsty cannibal.

"Bring him out!" she screamed. "Bring out the murdering pig who killed my husband. Bring out the unnatural Karesu. Bring him out!"

The gross, shambling creature named Karesu was hustled into the roaring hall, loaded with chains but still bearing himself like the proud Emperor he had been.

Makira-Kadesi saw him and split the air with a loud scream of unbelievable hatred, leaping high like a madwoman, which she was in fact. She crept up to the bound man like a stalking she-leopard and slashed him cruelly across the belly with her dagger. Then she danced away with a loud shriek of devilish joy. She circled round him again, dancing like a devil's flame, faster, faster and still faster. Then she stabbed viciously at his eyes, once, twice, thrice—leaving the helpless man's eye-sockets full of torn flesh. Then she danced away again under loud cheers from her bloodthirsty subjects.

"Let me speak!" cried the bleeding and blinded man Karesu. "Let me speak before I die. Let me speak . . ."

"Speak, dog, speak before I disembowel you!" cried Makira-Kadesi. "Whine and let me hear what you have to whine about."

"I wish to warn you, Oh Kadesi," said Karesu, "the gods tell me to warn you that the whole empire is in great danger and that if you can save it from this danger it will last forever and climb to the heights you dream of."

Makira froze where she stood. She had expected Karesu to beg for mercy or curse her; but not the words he was saying now. And she was surprised even more by the great calmness of his voice.

"Some time ago," continued the dying man, "the gods say that some time ago you took a slave out to the lake and drowned him secretly one night."

"Whaaat!" cried Makira. "What about that slave?"

"The gods say he is alive," whispered Karesu, as he sank to the ground, "Empire in danger . . . while he lives . . ."

"Where is he? Where do the gods say he is now?"

"In . . . near here . . . lake," gasped Karesu as he died.

"Guards!" screamed the Empress. "Call the guard commander here . . . quickly!"

While quick-fingered handmaidens were still helping Kadesi back into her attire, two heavily armed guard commanders and a battle leader clanked into the hall and bowed low before the Empress. She snapped out a few words to them and about an hour later the armed guards marched out of the gate of the city while the patrols in the city itself were heavily reinforced.

The guards left the city and fanned out in all directions in search of the one who had to be killed if Makira's empire were to be saved. Some went along the shores of the lake, while some took boats across the lake itself.

In the meantime the feasting in Kadesi's palace had come to an abrupt end and the guests had left for their homes. For a long while Kadesi sat alone in the silence while the torches were burning out one by one and parts of the Great Hall were plunged in darkness. She sat in deep thought and did not even see the young handmaiden who entered and knelt before her. The girl had to repeat what she said thrice before the Empress heard her and discovered her presence. "Your couch is ready, Oh Great Empress."

"I have no intention of going to bed. Call the guard commander and tell him to bring some of his men to escort me to the Temple of the Black Devil—quickly!"

The girl vanished behind the red drapery of the second door of the hall and Kadesi was once again left alone with only one torch burning. Then suddenly the solitary torch shook as if struck by an unseen hand; it snapped clean off the bracket holding it onto the wall and crashed to the floor with a dull clatter.

Kadesi leapt up, her eyes wild with fear and her heart pounding fiercely. "An ill omen," she gasped. "An evil omen for my beloved empire. But I shall fight to save it—I shall fight."

Then the guards came clattering into the darkened hall, followed by the two favourite handmaidens of the Empress. They found Kadesi standing near the door, trying her best to keep the expression of wild fear and horror off her face. "Let us go," she said curtly.

* * * * *

Dozens of oil lamps burn inside the Great Temple of the Black Devil Goddess of Darkness. A hideous image of stone towers above the black altar—extending right up to the roof. It leers down at the kneeling priestess from an obscene stone mouth and bulging sightless eyes. This hideous image was never carved by the Strange Ones; nor is it the work of a Black man. Legends say it fell from the skies, and its hideousness would seem to confirm this. The Strange Ones, having found this idol half-buried in the sands of the Ka-Lahari, had brought it into their city and built a temple for it. This idol was said to possess strange powers of evil and to be capable of devouring the soul of a man if it felt thus inclined.*

The priestesses—there are three—of the Devil Goddess are wearing nothing but brief loincloths and each wears a heavy black mask representing the Devil Goddess. All three wear heavy swords in leather sheaths at their sides and one of them carries a drum made out of the skull of a man with the top sawn off and a skin stretched across the brain cavity. This drum she beats with a short stick, a baby's skull forming the knob at one end. A trussed live calf lies on top of a pile of faggots on the black altar in front of the statue. Immediately behind the statue is a great stone bowl burnt black by countless fires. In this bowl is a pile of wood. Lying bound and helpless on this pile of wood are two captives—girls, both of them. The first of these is a young Black girl wearing the iron collar of a slave; the second is White, with flaming red hair and green eyes, and her enlarged abdomen denotes that she is soon to be a mother.

The throbbing drums, beaten by slaves hideously painted to represent Evil itself, send a steady rhythm through the macabre vault.

In the courtyard of the Temple, an alien god stands over a small altar to which is tied a loudly protesting dog that seems to have been very well fed indeed. The god is one of the obscene idols the Strange Ones brought with them from their far-off native land. In the porch of the Temple is a cage full of chattering and struggling monkeys. These holy monkeys are going to be used in the ceremony about to commence—and the dog also.

*For thousands of years after the fall of the empire of the Strange Ones, the witchdoctors of the Bechuana and later the Barotse, searched in vain for this alien idol, and the search is still continuing.

Suddenly a guard puts a horn to his lips and blows a short blast on it. Then he steps aside and the Empress Makira-Kadesi enters the temple courtyard, followed by her servants and gilt-armoured Palace Guards. They stop a few paces from the altar of the animal-headed god and the fat dog tied to the altar growls viciously. The three priestesses emerge from the temple itself, accompanied by a slave carrying a torch, and they briefly salute Kadesi by silently raising their hands. No talking is allowed near the Temple of Evil.

The First Priestess waves the Empress's retinue away and takes Kadesi by the hand, leading her nearer to the altar of the Dog-god. Then she suddenly draws her sword and slashes the raiment off the tall Empress, flinging the robes onto the pile of wood on the altar of the Dog-god. The Second Priestess reaches down and seizes the dog, unties it and holds it upside down, ignoring its loud protests. The Empress is made to kneel while the dog is held above her—its slavering mouth only a finger's length above her gold-crowned head. With a sudden vicious slash the First Priestess cuts the dog's throat and spurting blood deluges the naked Empress.

The Second Priestess flings the dog onto the altar and the slave dips the burning torch into the pile of wood to set it alight. In the grim light both priestesses now perform a silent, though vigorous dance while the Third Priestess seizes the Empress by the wrist and whips her soundly with a long whip she had been carrying.

Makira screams with pain until she falls in a swoon. The First and Third Priestesses now carry her between them into the Temple, while the Second Priestess takes the whip and throws it onto the sacrificial fire, lingering there to ensure that it burns properly. Then she joins the others.

The Empress is left inside the Temple near the door to recover while the three priestesses go behind the great Idol of Evil to light the fire in the bowl in which the two girls are tied hand and foot. The screams of the two victims ring through the Temple and Makira sits up near the door, her eyes wide with horror and pain. At long last the screams die away and the smell of burning human and dog flesh drifts over the city from the Temple of Evil.

Makira is now dragged forward and made to offer tufts of her hair on the black altar in front of the hideous idol. The First Priestess applies a torch to the pile of wood on which the trussed calf lies and the Empress watches in fascinated horror as the violently struggling animal dies. Then the First Priestess waves Makira and the other two priestesses back and prostrates herself before the black altar, and soon sweat is pouring down her face as she concentrates all her mental power in one telepathic call to the Spirit of Darkness.

For a long time the silent, unspoken call from the kneeling priestess shrieks into the depths of Eternity itself. The priestess has even stopped breathing as she concentrates her whole being into projecting this mind-message into the depths of Infinity, summoning the very essence of Evil to make an appearance in the Temple.

* * * * *

There is a blinding flash inside the Temple—a flash of sun-bright flame which consumes the kneeling priestess utterly. It is closely followed by a peal of thunder that shakes the city and the surrounding countryside. Then a loud noise like a thousand tempests roars through the city and the shocked night is filled with howls of a million demons as they converge on the Temple of Evil. Inside the Temple Makira hears the mystic strains of the Song of Eternity and sees a dark figure emerge from the roaring flames. Before her stands Watamaraka, the She-Devil, the Goddess of Evil!

(WHEN GRASS MEETS FIRE)

A GREAT darkness clouded the Temple of Evil, snuffing out the lamps, torches and altar fires, and the High Empress found herself standing alone in the eerie vault with ghostly, hideous shapes and faces leering at her. She stood facing the tall evil shape of the Devil Goddess Watamaraka—mother of all tokoloshes and demons. Kadesi suddenly felt a terror creeping over her, more than she had ever experienced before. It was one thing to worship the unseen forces; but to come face to face with them was another.

The golden Rebel Goddess suddenly smiled—a hard smile that sent icy worms crawling up and down the spine of the Empress. Her thin cruel lips twisted contemptuously as she said:

“You called me, and I am here. What do you want with me?”

“I want . . .” the Empress began.

“Oh stop, you make me sick!” snarled the Evil Goddess. “I know what you want—you want me to save your miserable empire—but are you willing to pay a price for it?”

“What is the price?” stammered Makira.

“The price to save your rotten empire is your own miserable self—your life in exchange,” said the She-Devil with a mocking smile.

“I must . . . die,” stammered Makira aghast. “How will my death save the empire, Oh Goddess; tell me—how!”

“I shall explain, stupid mortal,” sneered the Evil Goddess. “You must give me your body and let me rule your empire, masquerading as you. This means that your soul must leave your body and go to hell, while I enter and act through it. That is my price—take it or leave it.”

The Empress Kadesi-Makira suddenly felt like an animal in a cruel snare. She realised that Watamaraka had cornered her; there was no way out. Kadesi was very fond of life and everything she had done or planned so far had only one aim: to make her own life as sweet as possible. It is quite true that she wanted to make her empire great and to remove the threat of destruction—but she also wanted to live to enjoy the fruits of it all. The fact is that Makira-Kadesi did not care how many lives were lost in the process of making her empire great and secure—provided those lives belonged to others. Like all rulers and tyrants she was extremely selfish. She swallowed hard and looked pleadingly at the Evil Goddess who smiled back at her maliciously and said: “Well?”

“Can’t we reach . . . a . . . compromise? I mean . . .” stammered Makira.

“Oh, be quiet!” snarled the Goddess. “Your selfishness makes me sick.”

“But surely there must be another alternative . . .” Makira pleaded.

"Yes, there is," smiled the Goddess evilly. "Oh yes, there is! Call one of the priestesses and tell her to go and fetch me any Black female slave from your Palace—quick!"

Some time later a young female slave named Luluma, who had been given as a present to the Empress by her original owner, was hustled roughly into the Temple by one of the two surviving priestesses. The Black girl, her eyes wide with fear, was made to lie down on her back between Makira and the apparition Watamaraka.

"What . . . ?" asked Makira.

"You will find out soon enough—so keep quiet!" And with these words Watamaraka lifted her arms above her head and seemed to take a deep breath. Then a blinding flash of light lit up the Temple like the inside of a white-hot furnace, and Makira dropped unconscious. After a while she slowly regained consciousness and opened her eyes. She was surprised to find herself lying flat on her back and even more surprised to see a young tall woman towering over her like a pillar of beauty, wearing the tiara she herself had worn only moments previously.

"Get up, slave!" commanded the tall woman shortly.

As Makira rose the terrible truth dawned upon her—and it was a truth so fantastic, she could not bring herself to accept it. She could not believe that the Evil Goddess could actually have done this to her.

The apparition had vanished and Makira slowly realised that the tall woman standing before her was herself—her previous self. Her present self stood in the body of Luluma. And this to Makira was worse than death. She stood staring at the form that was hers. She saw herself as others saw her—a tall, mature and beautiful woman with a skin a few shades darker than the skin of the Strange Ones, with a strong face, a hard mouth and bright deepset eyes. Through a mist of bitter tears she saw the body she had been so proud of, now tenanted by the Goddess of Evil, Mother of all tokoloshes.

The crowned woman who had been Makira, smiled cruelly and snapped: "Get up, you blubbering black bitch, and get back to the Palace before I have you whipped."

"You foul she-devil!" cried Makira-Luluma. "I shall expose you. I shall . . ."

"Remove this slave and have her locked up in the Palace dungeon," Watamaraka-Kadesi ordered briskly.

* * * * *

The people of the Empire of the Strange Ones were astonished; never in all their lives had they seen anything like it. Never had they seen a ruler work them so ruthlessly as their new Empress Kadesi.

The empire was suddenly expanding and trade with foreign countries reached unheard-of heights. Tens of thousands of slaves were being exported, together with piles of ivory and gold dust. Wealth flooded the land once more, bringing more settlers to swell the population. Hundreds of slaves toiled and died miserably in the ore-mines and salt pans, while thousands of elephants were butchered. The Strange Ones had a unique way of hunting elephants: they dug deep pits, narrow in cross-section, and often lined with masonry. Inside these pits sat men armed with long spears. Others went out to drive the elephants towards them. As the elephants passed over or near the pits, the hidden spearmen thrust their spears deep into their bellies.

Six moons went by during which the Empire of the Strange Ones grew to great heights of glory and splendour, and soon its name became known to other nations. Like a protea it rose from the rocks of obscurity and isolation and it smiled at the sun like a bride in spring.

Then one day the slave woman Makira-Luluma escaped from a troop of slaves working in a plantation and fled into the dark forest.

* * * * *

After eight whole moons I returned to Makarikari—to the cave where Ninavanhu-Ma enlightened me on so many things. I had been wandering throughout the land; I had seen the great Lu-Kongo river where Odu and Amarava begat the first human beings after the destruction of the First People. I even saw where Amarava gave birth to the first Bushmen and Pygmies. Now we were back at our cave.

“That was a wonderful journey, beloved Goddess,” I said with a smile. “But you are not looking very happy at all—what can be the matter?”

“Humanity is in great danger, Lumukanda,” replied Ma seriously. “Something strange happened while we were away and a great evil now walks this land. We must act fast to stop it from overwhelming the rest of the world.” Then she sat silent for a while, as though listening to something. “Someone is coming in this direction. This is where I vanish and I leave everything in your hands.”

For a long time I stood waiting alone in the forest and at last I noticed a movement opposite me. A young girl, a young Black slave girl, came into view. There was an expression of wild fear on her face and she looked as if she was fast nearing the valley of insanity. She kept casting fearful glances over her shoulder and she did not see me until she was very close. I knew who she was—I remembered her very well; she was Luluma, the same girl who had comforted me on that dark morning after I had slain my parent.

“Luluma!” I said softly, “Luluma, what brings you here?”

The girl started and her eyes opened wide. With a jerk she jumped back. I had started to develop the ability to read thoughts, and I read terror in her mind—far greater than the terror she felt for whatever she was running from.

“Do you no longer remember me, Luluma?” I asked gently. “Why do you look so afraid? I am no ghost.”

“You . . . you . . .” she gasped with infinite horror.

My newly acquired powers of reading human thoughts were not yet extensively developed but I could sense guilt and great shame faintly through the more overpowering cloud of terror. I grasped her by her thin shoulders and forced her to look up at me. “Why are you scared of me, little one?”

The girl looked up at my smiling face and suddenly tears flooded her eyes. "I am not . . . I am not Luluma . . . Luluma . . . is dead!"

"Nonsense! I know you are Luluma. We were slaves together, remember?"

"Let me explain . . ." she stammered.

"If I let you explain you will no doubt tell me you are a blue-eyed impala with a pink tail. Come let us go to my cave and I shall give you something to eat first."

I took her by the wrist and drew her closer to me. Before she realised what had happened, we were inside my cave. She gasped in amazement. "How did we get here?"

"On the wings of mental power."

"Did you have these powers even while you were a slave?"

"No, I had the strange fortune to be saved from becoming a fish's dinner by a very charming Goddess . . ."

"A . . . a . . . Goddess?" gasped Luluma, her face turning more grey with horror.

"Yes, a Goddess, child, one of those things I used to think were only figments of some crazy old man's warped imagination."

Suddenly Luluma leapt to her feet with a flatly squeezed cry of fear and bolted for the entrance of the cave. But she virtually ricocheted off the radiance-shield enshrouding the apparition of Ma, who appeared in the entrance of the cave, and landed behind my back, gibbering like a monkey.

"Poor, poor thing, how you must have suffered," said Ma. "Do you know who this child is, Lumukanda?"

"Yes, I know her very well. She was a fellow slave . . ."

"Wrong! This is the High Empress Makira—her soul at least, contained inside the body of the girl Luluma whom you knew. Makira's real body is inhabited by my arch-enemy, the Goddess of Evil, Watamaraka. And unless I act promptly, the human race will go the way of the First People. Come, let us act now!"

* * * * *

In the city of the Strange Ones tension is mounting and rumours are flying like bats in the night. It seems that something totally without precedent has happened in a small fortified village on the northern border of the empire. Thousands of slaves had suddenly exploded into open armed rebellion and had not only destroyed the garrison in the village to the last man, but had massacred their masters and mistresses, and afterwards escaped into the forests beyond the border.

The governor of the north had sent a regiment in pursuit of these slaves, but the regiment had been totally annihilated in an ambush.

The Strange Ones are uneasy; men are carrying swords in the streets and if a slave so much as looks suspicious, they pounce upon him and slay him on the spot. There are differences of opinion; some want the slaves to be accommodated in bulk outside the city; others disagree as they feel the slaves might unite outside and attack the city.

To restore the people's confidence the Empress has ordered a parade of the armed might, and tens of thousands of troops are now marching through the streets, hauling their weird weapons of war. These include catapults for hurling vast stones, and giant bows capable of shooting bundles of spears, like arrows, with one shot. Also on parade is their latest weapon—a light structure drawn by only two oxen. It is also a catapult, but it hurls large bags full of an inflammable oil, and there are long wicks which are set alight before the missile is hurled. It is said that these murderous machines have been invented by the Empress herself.

The Great Square is crowded with people who have come to watch the demonstration. At the appointed hour a war machine is brought into position on the far side of the square. On the near side two slaves are tied to stakes planted in the ground. Scores of slaves have been herded together in another part of the square to witness the exhibition. There is an expectant silence as the soldiers prepare the machines and the wick on the oilbag is lit. The commander snaps out an order and the catapult fires with a thud. The bag sails through the air with a trail of smoke, and a loud cheer resounds as it hits the two slaves tied to the stakes.

"There you are, you black vermin!" shouts one of the soldiers to the crowd of slaves herded in the enclosure. "Would you like to rebel against us?"

"More . . . more . . . Give us more . . . show these black dogs!" The crowds roar with delight, while the two slaves writhe in agony in the flames.

From where she stands on her small portable platform the Empress smiles. She gives another curt order to one of her battle leaders, and another machine is brought into position, one that shoots a volley of spears at the same time. This time two female slaves are dragged out amid cheers from the crowds of Strange Ones.

But suddenly there is an interruption!

A tall, black-veiled woman emerges from the crowds and calmly walks into the centre of the square. She raises her arms and her loud voice shatters the silence:

"Stop! Enough!"

All eyes are fixed on her as she stands there in the centre of the square. A deeper silence falls upon the crowds and all mouths hang open in sheer astonishment. Then once more the voice rings out with compelling force:

"You . . . you there, who calls yourself the Empress Kadèsi . . . hear me! Hear what I have to say to you. You do not belong to this world and you have no right here. You must either stop your atrocious deeds or take the consequences. I am warning you!"

The Empress is being threatened within her Great City. The deep silence lies heavy on the crowds as everybody awaits the reactions of the Empress to this impudence. The Empress suddenly leaps off her platform and comes running towards the tall, veiled figure.

"You foul bitch . . . I'll teach you to insult me!"

A chorused howl of pure astonishment bursts from the crowds. The Empress has staggered backwards as if struck by an unseen hand. She spins head over heels and flops most disgracefully in the dust.

The Empress rises slowly and the watching crowds see her lips move as she asks her black-veiled enemy a question. They strain their ears in vain to hear the earnest conversation now in progress. Then, in utter astonishment they see their Empress, fear now written on her face, slowly turn . . . and walk away. The assembly opens a way for her and she silently passes through, followed by her bodyguard—shocked and undecided—like a pack of dogs with their tails between their legs. The departing party melts away with the crowds and all astonished eyes now turn to the mysterious veiled figure, proudly striding away in another direction.

* * * * *

She comes straight down the narrow street towards where I am standing with the young slave woman Luluma, and in a voice charged with feigned haughtiness she shouts, loudly enough for some passers-by to hear: "Attend me, you unclean beasts, and let us go!"

Like obedient slaves we follow the veiled woman at a discreet distance, making the hundreds of people who had been following the mysterious figure believe we are nothing but a couple of slaves following their widowed mistress home. Thus we entered the city and now we are returning "home" somewhere in the poorer quarters of the city.

And now things are happening fast and I can feel in my bones that the 'end' is indeed within sight.

I know that Watamaraka in the guise of the Empress Kadesi is fully aware of the presence within her city of Ninavanhu-Ma, in the guise of a widowed mistress—and soon these mighty giantesses from the depths of Eternity, are going to be locked in a titanic struggle.

(LUMUKANDA TURNS TRAITOR!)

WHEN we reached the house after successfully dodging the vast crowds that had followed us, we closed and bolted the door. I then turned to our mistress and asked her what she had said to the Empress Watamaraka-Kadesi.

"Well, when I struck her down with the powers at my disposal, she soon enough realised who I was. I told her I have decided to give her three moons in which to make her exit from this world and return to exile beyond the River Time. She said she would think it over. I now know that there is going to be an open clash between us very soon—and that will be an interesting battle."

"What will happen . . . if you lose?" asked the slave girl Luluma, whose soul was that of Makira.

"If I lose, the whole world and the Universe will disintegrate, and chaos and nothingness will rule supreme."

Tears flooded the eyes of the young slave girl. "Goddess, I speak as Makira, and I speak in earnest. I have murdered, cheated and tortured, all on behalf of this useless plaything-empire, which I can see will soon be wiped off the face of history. Please, I beg you, do whatever you like—wipe it off, and destroy every human being in it. But do not fail to destroy Watamaraka, the Mother of Demons. Destroy her, above all."

"The coming battle between Watamaraka and me will decide the future of creation. But I am very worried indeed, because I can foresee you, Lumukanda, turning traitor and betraying me to the force of evil."

"What!" I cried. "Me a traitor?"

Two days after that, news came to the Great City from the south—news that increased the tension within the empire to fever pitch. A great revolt had broken out in the land of the Ba-Tswana nation and vast hordes of slaves and half-white malcontents were razing the imperial towns to the ground and freeing slaves who swelled the ranks of the destruction-mad rebels tremendously. These hordes were being led by a young woman of strange appearance whom many called the Wild Huntress.

This young woman was an albino and she always dyed her hair a bright violet. She claimed to be the daughter of the Evening Star. No one knew who her parents had been but this much was known that she was an albino of the race of the Strange Ones. A deadly archer, she was leading her blood-thirsty hordes nearer and nearer to the Great City. Destruction pure and simple, and not conquest, was this woman's motive—and she was destroying thoroughly—and utterly.

Then close in the wake of these unpleasant tidings came more news from the north. A slave named Lubo had escaped from the Great City some time ago, it was said, and this slave had succeeded in reaching the northern border of the empire which he crossed and somehow made himself leader of the slaves who had already rebelled and escaped.

Now this Lubo, it was said, was ravaging the northern and eastern provinces and his hordes were also coming nearer and nearer to the Great City, from the east. When news of members of their race being mercilessly butchered by the rebel slaves reached the ears of the citizens of the Great City, they went wild with rage and fear and hatred. Howling mobs of the Strange Ones roamed the streets, murdering any Black slave they saw. Slaves who had been loyal for as long as they had been alive were beheaded by their very owners; some had their limbs torn from their bodies; some were hurled from the walls into the moat. No mercy was shown to any slave, male, female, young or old.

Within an hour the whole city had become one reeking slaughter pit—bodies of dead slaves strewn everywhere, up and down every street. But some owners hid their slaves in deep cellars, while others smuggled them out of the city. There were those who died or were injured in the process of defending their slaves against the mobs. There were, there are, and always will be, those with feelings for others.

I was asleep when all this started, and even as Luluma awoke me, our Goddess had already sprung into action. She was now standing on the highest tower in the city and projecting her penetrating voice across the length of the city:

"People from beyond the seas . . . hear me . . . the Guardian Angel of all living things—you included. I command you to stop killing those whom I have placed under my protection. I order you to leave them alone and allow them to leave your cursed city. I warn you—leave them alone, or face my vengeance!"

The shocked city heard . . . and saw . . . the Source of Life! They stood where they were, petrified. And in the minds of all re-echoed the words:

... your cursed city ... your cursed ..."

They knew their city was doomed, even before it was destroyed, and they knew that their race would soon be nothing but the faintest of faint echoes in the grottoes of history.

"... your cursed city ..."

They watched as thousands of slaves streamed out of the city and somehow they knew that within the breast of everyone burned a red-hot torch of vengeance. They were lost, they knew it; their death sentence had been passed ...

So, the people of the last remaining city of the empire stood to arms for the rest of that day, and for the three days following. They did not know that in future there would not be a single member of their descendants who would carry forth their memory; but that instead, a continent full of people would carry forth the memory of those they had enslaved and murdered!

On the fifth day reports came that the armies, or rather hordes, lead by Lubo from the east, and the Wild Huntress from the south, were only a day's journey from the city. On that day all the Strange Ones fled to the confines of the city walls, leaving homes and farms behind. No slave, however loyal, was admitted into the safety of the city and those who had Bushman and Hottentot wives left them to their fate. These wives who had shared couches with the proud Strange Ones were butchered to the last soul by the slave hordes.

Abandoned, the slaves streamed across the plains in their thousands to join Lubo and increase his already over-swollen hordes.

Inside the walls of the Great City much was happening, the most important being the sudden disappearance of the Empress—deserting her people in their hour of peril. The shocked people did not know the truth, of course, the truth of her changed personality. The Mother of Demons had wearied of playing Empress and had simply left the city.

Another interesting happening was that two battle leaders became involved in a duel over the vacated throne, in which the one died shortly after having killed the other.

A young fifteen-year-old boy, the last descendant of the first Emperor, was crowned in a stirring ceremony in which nearly all the people in the city took part—their last coronation ceremony on earth.

The young boy rose after the formalities were concluded and addressed the cheering crowd, concluding: "Let us fight to the very end. If the savages attack us, Oh my people, let us give them something with which to remember us till the end of time. If you must fall, Oh my people, fall as true warriors should—and fall after sending at least ten of the black swine to hell."

The sun set in a blaze of fiery splendour. It set slowly, as if anxious to prolong the empire's last day ...

* * * * *

A voice called softly out of the moon-bathed forest. It called once ... twice ... thrice ... It was a voice of enchantment, a voice of pure seduction. It spoke of longing, a ravaging hunger such as no human being can ever feel and remain alive. It spoke of a great loneliness, surpassed only by the fury of hell itself. It was the voice of temptation . . . of pure Evil. It said: "Lumukanda . . ."

I was sitting outside the cave and inside my beloved Goddess was lost in pleasant repose. The girl Luluma was fast asleep at the entrance, comfortably curled up underneath a leopard skin. My inquisitiveness prompted me to explore the origin of the pleasant voice, and I quietly stole down the slope into the forest. The shadows closed over me, obstructing the silver light of the all-seeing moon.

Something kept telling me to go back to those to whom I owed allegiance. But another something told me to proceed and meet the owner of the voice. Briefly I hesitated and actually took a step back. But a pair of hungry arms reached out and caught me in a tempestuous embrace. It was the embrace of Watamaraka-Kadesi!

I was lost in a sea of pleasure such as no man had ever known on this earth. I felt as though I was flying high among the silver stars. I was like a bird—a lost butterfly among a field of scented flowers in another world, beyond Eternity. I was lost . . . lost like a fly smothering in a pot of honey—unable to fly and just dying slowly in its own delight, like a drunkard drowning in his favourite beer!

Suddenly a soft mournful melody rose like a dark cloud in the silver skies of ecstasy through which I was floating. It was the wailing death-song of millions of stars over a blatantly betrayed Universe. And I, Lumukanda, had betrayed the stars, the earth, mankind, into the hands of Evil!

A wave of horror swept over me—a wave of leaden remorse; I have condemned the Universe by flirting with destruction. For a few moments of transient joy I had sold all that is holy to Evil itself. I struggled to free myself, but Watamaraka-Kadesi smiled mockingly in my face. "It is too late to escape now, Oh Lumukanda, I have you in my power. In your height of passion you vowed to do anything for me and now I am holding you to that vow. Go back to the cave and unclasp the Necklace of Life from Ninavanhu-Ma's neck, and also the mutsha of Fertility from her hips, and bring them to me. Have I made myself clear?"

"I hear and obey."

"Now I have Ninavanhu-Ma at my mercy," laughed Watamaraka.

(UNDER THE FLOODS OF TIME)

THERE was a flash brighter than the brightest thing imaginable—a flash of light which filled the cave with its blinding glare and a roar of sound that seemed to shatter every bone in my body. Then silence.

I opened my eyes and found we were no longer inside the cave. We were not even on earth, as far as I could make out, but somewhere . . . somewhere, it seemed, on the very frontiers of dark Eternity. We were on the edge of an incredible cliff—a mighty precipice that stretched down into the deepest reaches of Infinity. It plunged down into the depths of darkness, darker than the darkest darkness imaginable. I looked around to find the source of an eerie light behind me. Some distance away was a glowing vapour.

Ninavanhu-Ma and Watamaraka had taken their dispute to the all-knowing Great Spirit . . .

I shuddered and turned my face away from the eerie light. I looked down at the woman whose head was resting on my thigh and who seemed unconscious—or dead. I looked down upon the Empress Makira, and something told me her soul had been restored to her body—the body it belonged to. A ghostly shape stood some distance away to my left, looking down sorrowfully at the obviously dead body of Luluma, the slave girl. And I knew somehow that this ghostly shape was the soul of Luluma, weeping over the body it could not again inhabit.

Dawn was breaking in the sky. The dispute between Ninavanhu-Ma and Watamaraka had not been settled and it died like the cooking fires of yester-year. The Spirits of Good and Evil are destined to stay with Humanity in equal proportions till the River of Time ceases to flow.

The Empress Makira-Kadesi and I buried Luluma and we went out onto a low hill overlooking the Great City of the Strange Ones for which the dawn brought no hope. I knew, without being told, that the hordes of the Wild Huntress were now within striking distance from the city, and Lubo was not far away either.

For a long time I stood looking down on the heavily defended walls of the city where thousands of armed men stood ready to die for their homes. I realised that the two attacking hordes could easily be cut to pieces in no time at all, and I did not like the idea of so many human lives being sacrificed merely to destroy that city. A plan had already come to my mind whereby the city could be taken with as few casualties to the attacking forces as possible.

Then something I had not foreseen happened, just as the sun rose, sending long shadows streaming westwards over the dew-moist grass. I had known that the Wild Huntress was close, but I had not anticipated her being so close.

There came loud cries from the forest to the west of the city and a vast horde burst from the cover of the trees in a savage attack on the city walls. Some of the yelling attackers were carrying great rafts with which to cross the moat while others carried scaling ladders, clearly improvised during the night. They came close enough to send volleys of arrows from countless bows at the defenders of the city crouching on the walls. Even as I watched, the first rafts were launched across the moat, full of shouting and determined men. Raft after raft was launched until there were ten crawling up to the stockades. It was then that the defenders struck—quickly and pitilessly.

With devastating suddenness the mighty throwing machines on the stockades cut loose with a hail of stones the size of human beings, and these were joined by the giant bows and firebag catapults. The whole magic power of the war machines of the Strange Ones was concentrated on the ten rafts. Four were shattered by direct hits and soon the moat was turned into a pitiful emulsion of dying humanity.

Loud cheers of victory rang out from the walls and I was sure I heard across the long distance challenging sounds from the Strange Ones—inviting them to try again. The challenge was not accepted. In a mass wound-licking move they withdrew into the forest.

I stood there watching as the defenders shouted and danced in wild jubilation on the walls. I was determined to go down there in person and spoil their amusement. That city was an excrescence which interfered with the history of my people, and it was contrary to the laws of the Great Spirit who laid down that each race of humans should be left alone to find its own destiny without outside interference.

I descended the hill, determined to seek out the Wild Huntress, whoever she might be, and offer her my services. Soon I stood at the edge of the forest and it occurred to me that I now had powers which I might as well use. I simply wished myself to be within the presence of the Wild Huntress, wherever she might find herself.

For a moment my vision blurred and as my surroundings came into focus again I found myself standing waist deep in water, directly behind a long-haired young woman who was being bathed by two former female slaves. One of the latter saw me and let out a loud shriek of fear and there was a series of loud splashes as the women tried to escape into deeper water.

"He came out of empty air!" cried one. "It is an evil spirit of some sort."

Standing chest deep in water now, the three women regarded me with wide eyes for a few moments, then the wide-shouldered alien albino in the centre opened her mouth and found a voice:

"Who are you? Get away from here—get away, you ugly devil!"

I put a fierce snarl on my face and opened my eyes very wide as I took a few steps closer to the women. "I haven't had breakfast yet; little women are my favourite dish!"

"You wouldn't dare!" cried the pink-skinned one. "You just try eating me and I'll . . . I'll . . ."

"You will what? I asked with a smile.

"I'll kill you!"

Blood-thirsty this time of the morning, aren't you?" I remarked as I slowly moved closer.

The girl's eyes blazed in a sudden burst of cold rage, and her nostrils dilated, hissing with short breath. She squeezed a flood of words from between clenched teeth:

"No, you black demon, I do not like killing people . . . only a certain kind—my own kind. These I kill without compunction and I also raze their cities to the ground so properly that no-one will ever know they had ever been there. I leave their carcasses to rot where they fall. I torture some before I kill them . . . Do you know why?"

"Yes, because you seem to be well out of your mind."

"You insufferable devil! You black son of a . . . lame goat and a . . . a dead hippopotamus! Why you . . ."

"Now, now, now," I admonished sweetly. "Let us first get our facts straight. A lame goat cannot mate with a dead hippopotamus . . ."

"Why . . . you . . . why . . ."

"Because the goat's back is lame and the hippo is . . . well . . . dead!"

"Be silent you!" She bared her teeth in savage rage. "Do you know who I am? Or rather, do you know whose daughter I am?"

"I hope not the product of a similar combination such as you suggested for me."

"I am the daughter of the Empress Makira . . . and one of the battle leaders of her army.”

“And does that entitle you to damage her property?”

The girl composed herself and looked down into the water. “She . . . she is a swine! I have vowed that I will kill her with my own hand. I am going to make her whine for mercy before I kill her. When she was still an unknown half-caste harlot, she seduced my father and made him join forces with her to overthrow the Emperor Karesu. When they discovered I was an albino they both disowned me and left me in the forest for wild animals to devour. But a roving band of Bushmen found me . . . and brought me up. Now I am back . . . for revenge.”

“And I have come to help you, though my motive is somewhat different. I am going to show you a way of taking that city with the loss of as few lives as possible.”

“Oh, but I do not care how many lives it will take—my own included—but that city must be wrecked!”

“Calm yourself child, calm yourself. Get out of the water and summon your warriors. We have a lot to do.”

* * * * *

For the rest of that day thousands of men took turns at, what was for them, a most puzzling task. From where they were encamped, the forest crept along the lake front to quite close to the city. From a point closest to the city, but still under cover of the thick bush, they began to dig a large hole in the soft earth. We made the hole, and afterwards the tunnel, big enough to accommodate many workers at the same time. Scores of slave-blacksmiths worked unceasingly forging heavy hoes for digging and axes for cutting supports for the sides and roof of the tunnel. A mound of earth grew higher and higher as long lines of men emptied great baskets full of earth from the tunnel. It had to be dug deep enough to allow safe passage underneath the moat and the foundation of the wall. Deeper and deeper went the tunnel under the expert hands of those who had worked in the mines of the Strange Ones, and at sunset it was more than three-quarters of the way across to the unsuspecting city.

The motley “armies” of the Wild Huntress were so carried away by what they were doing that they continued the work throughout the night. The idea of tunnelling under the very feet of the city’s defenders and emerging behind them provided the toiling men with many a foul joke as the night wore on. Many were the speculations about how surprised the Strange Ones would be when they saw us emerge in their midst like harvester ants. At daybreak my old friend, now Chief Lubo, arrived with his fresh hordes—about a hundred thousand, counting fighting men only. Lubo provided us with fresh workers and other teams were formed to make ladders and rafts for the frontal attack above ground which had to start the moment a breakthrough was achieved with the tunnel to distract attention.

There were about two thousand Bushmen in the Wild Huntress’s hordes and these I organised into a separate battalion of light archers and briefed them on spearheading the tunnel attack, which I would lead personally.

Lubo had also brought a hundred dugout canoes with which he had intended to attack the city from its weakest side—that facing on Lake Makarikari. We decided to carry out this plan as a further means of distracting attention from the tunnel breakthrough.

At last the headman in charge of tunnelling came back to report that they had broken surface and that they were fortunate enough to emerge within a garden well enclosed within a high mud wall. I ordered the men to rest while I traversed the long tunnel for an inspection. I emerged in a city whose streets were as quiet as a graveyard—into which we turned it pretty soon. By a strange twist of fate the tunnel had emerged in the garden of the house of my erstwhile owner. Now the great house stood empty because all the occupants, women and children, had taken refuge in the strong fort in the centre of the city while every able-bodied man and boy was manning the walls. I returned and ordered the Bushmen impi into the tunnel. They poured into the tunnel like so many ants and were closely followed by three-quarters of Lubo's and half of the Wild Huntress's savages.

Before the Strange Ones became wise as to what was happening, thirty thousand fighting men had emerged within the city and had infiltrated through the empty houses and had already effectively surrounded the fort in the centre, completely cutting it off from those manning the walls. Night had already fallen and only the stars came out to grace a sullen and moonless sky. I looked up at them and said quietly: "This night you shall see the end of a proud empire, of proud men, who in their insolence and greed never dreamt that such a fate could strike them. They thought they had their tyrant feet securely planted—but they could not control or rule the River Time, which swallows the proudest empires and over whose rapids now cascades the Canoe of Eternal Death, carrying with it the empire of the Strange Ones to the seas of Oblivion."

Lubo was saying to his battle leaders: "Men, remember what you owe these creatures—not long ago you whined under their lash. They denied you the simple right of choosing your mates; they bred you like beasts, and they bought and sold you like beasts. The souls of those they have murdered are even now wandering aimlessly and weeping incessantly in the Spirit Land. Only one thing will pacify them: the death of the very last member of the creatures in this city. Strike, and show no mercy!"

In the meantime the sham frontal attack was being mounted and the Wild Huntress was leading the fleet of war canoes over the quiet, dark surface of the lake. Then we heard the savage roar from thousands of throats as the frontal attack was launched. We heard the distant thuds of the alien war machines on the walls as a hail of large stones hurtled out and the trails of burning fire-bags traced arcs through the night sky, rising and vanishing like comets beyond the walls. A wall of fire in the background lighted the skies.

I pointed to the dark fort in the centre of the city. "Go, Lubo, seize that fort and spare nobody. The rest of you follow me!"

The entire Bushman impi followed me towards the weakly defended lake front wall. We ran through the silent streets, past trading houses, gardens and small temples, and a house of evil entertainment with alien statues of mating men and women decorating the steps. There was a long agonizing cry from the wall towards which we were running and an armoured body crashed from the top of the wall. The Wild Huntress's attack had begun and scores of figures running about in confusion were faintly silhouetted against the star-jewelled sky.

A little while later a group of dark figures came walking towards us and we were issued with a haughty challenge. It was the voice of the Wild Huntress herself. I laughed and told her to come closer.

"It was easy," she said tersely. "They had only a few men on the wall and only one stone-throwing machine, which sank two of our canoes. But the wall is in our hands. What do we do next?"

"Have all your men disembarked from their canoes already?"

"Long ago," was her curt reply. "We are all inside the city."

"Then call them all together and follow me to the fort in the centre of the city—quickly."

When we came to the fort we found that a fierce battle was still in progress between Lubo's warriors and the gilt-armoured Palace Guards, now commanded by the boy king of the Strange Ones. It seemed as if the Strange Ones had not only brought their women and children and very old men into the fort, but also their boy Emperor with his strong bodyguard. These heavily armoured guards were now standing shoulder to shoulder just inside the fallen gate, forming a solid wall of bronze shields from behind which they inflicted heavy casualties among Lubo's impi.

A huge stone idol stool on an ornate pedestal not far away from the gate, and to this I made my way through the swarming hordes of attacking warriors. I picked the statue off its pedestal and charged with it into the solid phalanx of guardsmen defending the gate. Three guardsmen went down and through the gap thus formed tore the Wild Huntress, Lubo and their followers, their swords hacking the confused guards down before they could re-form. Their heavy armour put them at a great disadvantage compared with the light-footed, more mobile attackers.

The guards died to the last man, but even as they died they took many of their former slaves with them. The howling hordes of Bushmen and Bantu roared into the main gate of the round, triple-walled fort and loud shrieks crashed against the star-sprayed skies as hundreds of women and children of the Strange Ones saw their death bursting in on them in a very real form. A troop of women, armed with bows and arrows, briefly delayed the attackers at the second gate. But these were promptly cut down by a hail of Bushmen arrows—however, not before one of them had sent a shaft into the belly of the Wild Huntress. She fell with a loud scream—of anger, rather than pain.

"Forward! Forward!" Lubo encouraged his men.

Then happened something that was both beautiful and pathetic—pathetic and most unusual—and something I knew would live for ever in song and story for as long as the Land of the Tribes still felt the ocean breakers roaring against its shores—for as long as the sacred symbol of the Story-tellers of the Tribes, the mamba with a flower in its mouth, was carried to the Holy Place on the nights of story-telling:

The young boy Emperor stood alone in the innermost gate of the triple-walled fort. He stood there, wearing a white loincloth and a bronze corselet that was too big and far too heavy for him. A heavy bronze helmet covered his whole head and his long jet-black hair tumbled from below it in heavy streams on to his shoulders. In the flickering light of the two torches burning on brackets on either gatepost we could see through the gap in his helmet that his great dark eyes were wide with fear and tears were running down his pale cheeks. But there was a firmness about his quivering mouth which was both comical and impressive. He was holding a short sword in his hands—a sword than any man would have wielded in one hand only—and his legs seemed to be doing their best to stand firm and straight, while they yearned to turn and start running away from under the brave child.

“No! No!” he screamed to the approaching warriors. “You go back, you dirty savages—you lowdown slaves . . . you! Go, go baaaaack!”

The howling warriors closed in on him and the boy’s sword flashed in the dim light of the torches as he fought fiercely like the brave young lion he was. A careless warrior fell with a loud cry, and another . . . and yet another. Although he was completely surrounded and being stabbed and struck at from all sides, the young Strange One fought on and on. He was bleeding heavily and clearly becoming weaker. Then, with a last heart-rending, loud appeal to his long-death mother to save him, he fell and was cruelly trampled underfoot by Lubo's frontmost attackers. And even as he was trampled down his soul went and joined his mother's.

The fierce hordes swarmed over him into the very interior of the fort and soon loud screams of agony and shrieks of fear told the shocked night that when a thing is worth doing, it is worth doing properly. There was killing going on—by men whom years, and a lifetime of suffering and humiliation, had tortured into beasts that knew no pity. Afterwards I saw blood-crazy warriors doing a victory dance with the long-haired heads of women impaled on the points of their spears. As I walked through the sickening carnage I recalled an old saying which the old man Obu also once quoted to me when I was still a slave: "For every act of evil people commit there always will be, some day punishment in equal measure."

Some of the warriors were already plundering the dead and had not Lubo reminded them angrily that the city was still far from taken, the warriors would have been caught unawares by the main army which had been manning the walls. These troops had heard the cries and clamour coming from the fort in which were their women and children and hastened along to investigate. As they came charging down the streets they ran into cloud after cloud of poisonous Bushmen arrows. The Bushmen were holding them at bay while the hordes of Lubo and the Wild Huntress crept around behind them to cut off their retreat and split them off from further assistance that might come from the walls.

This was the fiercest battle and the Strange Ones fought bitterly. They fought till the last man fell in the streets of the city in which they had been lords and masters for so long.

Not all of them died bravely, however. Some died like screaming cowards, having thrown away their weapons and gone running through the streets like warthogs gone mad. Some died begging for mercy—from the men whom they had enslaved. Others died in the act of looting the houses of their fellows. The fat chief Battle Leader of the Strange Ones was captured while trying to sneak out of the city with a chest full of the dead boy Emperor's royal jewels. I ordered him to be taken to the forest and kept alive there, together with his two concubines, for a certain delicious reason I had in mind.

The Wild Huntress was dead, as was Chief Obu, who had been struck accidentally by a stray Bushman arrow, while leading the attack on the last survivors, who had barricaded themselves inside the Temple of Evil. These were a group of the poets and philosophers of their race and they all committed suicide just as Obu's warriors broke the barricades. One old madman had even extended a blessing over the attacking warriors before plunging a dagger into his own heart.

Dawn broke in the skies and the all-seeing Lord of Day emerged and saw. Lo! By the mighty lake of Makarikari, which in later years was to become nothing but a desolate salt pan—a city of the dead. A city which already belonged to the past, and which was now destined to survive as a mere legend in the minds of the children of those who destroyed it.

For three whole days tens of thousands of Bantu, Bushmen and half-castes laboured in the great city, razing houses to the ground and scattering the stones all over the countryside. The towers and temples disappeared to the lowermost reaches of their foundations. Many ornamental articles, utensils and weapons somehow became spared as trophies and heirlooms, but the bulk of whatever was not breakable, like armour, metal vessels and bronze statuary, was taken into the forest and melted down. Lubo had sworn an oath that if he succeeded in taking the city he would destroy it so thoroughly that not the faintest trace would be left.

On the fourth day the task of merciless destruction had been completed, and all that could still be seen was the great oblong clearing of the Great Square, some traces of the streets, and some foundations of private homes. Even these traces were destined to disappear at the hands of wind and weather, and all that remained which could betray the site was the mass of shaped stones widely scattered in the vicinity.

Then we proceeded with great celebrations in the forest. In the course of these celebrations the high Battle Leader of the Strange Ones and his two concubines—the three very last survivors—were brought in and prepared for the pot. They tasted considerably better than they looked, and they looked much less insolent and brave as they were passed around on our meat trays and stew bowls.

It was during the wild dancing and the loud singing and shouting by all the freedom-drunk people that the High Chief Lubo raised his hands for silence. After the crowds had quietened down and gathered in closer, Lubo raised his fierce voice to the heavens:

My people . . . this is for us a day of great joy and jubilation. Today we have come out of the evil hut of slavery and its door has closed behind us for ever. Today we have crossed the river of blood and tears and beyond we now see the dawn of our smiling future. Today we must mould ourselves into a mighty nation which no aliens would ever dare to enslave again. Let us mould ourselves into a nation of Strength, Beauty, Plenty and Prosperity. Let us call ourselves the Lu-Anda—‘they that increase’.”

People leapt up and, delirious with joy, they danced, sang and cried loudly: ‘Lunda! Luaaaanda! Luanda! . . . Lunda!’

* * * * *

On that day was founded the mighty Lu-Nda nation which, together with the Ba-Kongo, was in later years to rule vast tracts of land from the shores of the Western Ocean to where the land of Ka-Tanga is today.

I placed a solemn blessing on the Lunda people, inspired by the Goddess Ninavanh-Ma, and I encouraged them to spread like the sweet luvande flowers and to bring joy and happiness to all—something they had not known for so long.

INDABA MY CHILDREN

But on the Lunda people Watamaraka also placed her kind of blessing. She instilled in them a patient vengeful spirit and blatant ferocity, especially in battle. Even today the Lunda are among the fiercest warriors and the most vengeful people under the sun.

* * * * *

A month after all this I had a remarkable vision as I walked through the forest. I saw a strange tree, most unlike any I had ever seen, and whose girth was incredible. It was not growing in the ground like other trees, but walked about on its roots like a spider, or a crab. And it spoke to me: "I am the Tree of Life who brought living things to this earth and I am the husband of both Ninavanhu-Ma and Watamaraka. You have interfered with both my wives, and for that I curse you and condemn you to Eternal Blindness, and in future you will be known as the Blind War-god Lumukanda."

THE JOURNEY TO “ASAZI”

IN MY WEB—A DEAD FLY

THE land was a thing of incredible beauty, a jewel under the eyes of Ilanga, the God of Day. The land rejoiced in the green and scented embrace of the Maiden Spring and fiercely responded to her tender caresses, like an old wrinkled chief whose cold and tired veins are briefly heated by a kiss from his youngest concubine. The wild beauty of the untamed forest on that glorious day dazzled the eyes. Souls were lost in the misty valleys of happiness.

Each tree and bush was like a bride in full wedding regalia, a bride beautiful and soothing to the beholder's eye. Thick on each branch was a fresh green scented foliage that spoke of quantities of moisture yielded by a willing soil. Wild flowers laughed amongst the frolicking grass, nourished by the rotted leaves of yesteryear.

Birds argued in the tall trees while hares and steenbuck gambolled in the scented grass, rejoicing in the gentle heat and the perfumed whispering breeze of young summer.

And lo, along one of the footpaths leading into the cool shady depths of the deep forest there came a young man and a young woman. The man was tall, with the wide shoulders and narrow hips of a warrior, and the long legs of a very fast runner. He had a long face that ended in a square cleft chin, the kind which the Wise Ones of the Tribes call the "chin of courage". Under the flat nose with its large flaring nostrils was a mouth forever set in hard lines of fierce determination, while above, his forehead towered high like a cliff above two springs of sparkling water.

Around his head this young man wore a broad band of leopard skin with two feathers tucked in it: one the long tail-feather of an Isakabuli; the other that of a flamingo. The first denoted his royal birth and the second identified him as the son of the Second High Wife of the Chief. A triple necklace of lion's claws and cowrie shells graced his shoulders while around his manly loins he wore two aprons of cow-skin—one in front and one behind.

The front apron was fringed with long monkey and civet cat tails. On both his forearms he wore heavy bronze "warrior bracelets", so broad they looked more like arm guards. Around his calves he wore leggings of cow-tails which fluffed ever so slightly in the breeze.

He carried a black war shield with a civet cat skin tuft on its long centre stick and he was armed with two heavy hurling assegais and a weighty battle axe. He walked a few paces ahead of the girl with the lithe grace of a stalking beast of prey. His nostrils were dilated and his ears alert for the slightest sound. Haaaieeee! Here was a budding warrior, a hunter still in tender flower, a future leader of men. Here was a man born to command! Brave and utterly reckless was the son of Malandela, the High Chief of the Nguni division of the mighty Mambo nation. Brave, reckless and utterly stubborn was the handsome young man Zwangezwi—the Voice of Battle, the last surviving son of the High Chief of the Land, successor to the chieftainship of the Nguni limb of the Mambo people!

And ewu, ha-la-la! Now we come to the girl, the foreign ebony black girl who was not of the Mambo people, but belonged to a tribe which was once great and which had been reduced to only a few thousand people through wars. This tribe which was now in danger of becoming absorbed by the Mambo . . . unless . . .

This girl was tall and slender, with long legs and with breasts jutting fiercely from her chest. But she was the kind of girl whom chiefs forbid to bear children because, although her buttocks were beautifully shaped, her hips were far too narrow. She was beautiful. Yea-ha, she reminded one of a skilfully carved image from the land of Tanga-Nyika; she was a beautiful image carved in living ebony. Her face was oval and her forehead round and smooth. Her nose was tiny and flat, with small nostrils, and her full, wholesome mouth had a lower lip slightly more prominent than the upper. Her neck, graced by a broad band of flaming red copper, was a column of live ebony.

Whereas the Nguni maidens of her age either wore fringed mutshas, short skin shirts, or just nothing at all, this foreign girl wore something which no Nguni female would ever wear—a soft tiger-cat loinskin. Save for large copper earrings that weighted down her pierced earlobes and the band around her neck, she wore no other ornaments.

One could tell at first glance that this girl was very uneasy, that her soul was a canoe floundering in the whirlpool of fear and great anxiety. Nervous were the glances that she cast about her and she paused now and again to wring her hands and to open her mouth as if to speak to the young man in front of her, and then to shut it with a silent sob. The dew of tears hung heavy on her long eyelashes and the spirit of dread and guilt was heavy on her knees. Suddenly the man's voice shattered her troubled thoughts with a loud "Aieeee! Look over there . . . over there Mulinda, look!"

The girl's tear-misted and half-closed eyes slowly opened wider and followed the young man's pointed finger. They saw what is one of the most terrible omens of naked evil that anyone can experience. A mighty eagle had dived out of the blue skies into a grassy glade to their left, and now it was rising again into the heavens with a young steenbuck clutched in cruel talons. The keen eyes of the young Prince followed the eagle into the distance until it was but a speck above the hazy forest. Then he turned to Mulinda and she saw that his handsome features were clouded with uneasiness.

"That was an evil thing we saw, Oh Mulinda," he said, "for do not the Wise Ones say that to see an eagle snatching an animal off the ground is an omen of death to all those who see it?"

"It is so, my Prince," agreed the girl. "We must turn back and go home."

"No!" cried Zwangezwi, the son of Malandela, fiercely. "We have come so far and cannot turn back now. You will not escape so easily from giving me what you were told to give me, Oh daughter of the Vamangwe."

The son of Malandela and the Vamangwe girl were going far away from their homes to break a law. They were going deeper and deeper into the dangerous forest to find a quiet place in which to break one of the oldest tribal laws, the High Law which says that no young man under the age of twenty-five must take a girl to the love-mat; and that no young man should as much as kiss a girl unless he is first circumcised and initiated into manhood in accordance with the High Laws and Customs of the Tribes.

Zwangezwi was only twenty years of age and he thought that five years was far too long a time to wait before he was initiated and permitted to enjoy the doubtful privileges of manhood. He was very tired of sitting near the crackling fire at night and listening to lurid, in fact, very exaggerated accounts by older warriors of what they do to their lovers. Zwangezwi was firm in his belief that akuko okwedlula uku zibonela wena (nothing beats having seen and experienced something yourself). He was firm in his resolve to have personal experience of what he had heard so much about. But the young man should have remembered another old saying that ukutanda Ukwazi izim fhlo ezingalingani nawe ikona okwemuka u nogwaja umsila wa khe (it was curiosity that shortened the rabbit's tail—or, more literally, the desire to know secrets that are above you is the thing that deprived the rabbit of his tail).

* * * * *

At last they came to a grassy clearing above which towered a huge outcrop of rock with a large cave at its base, a cave which Zwangezwi knew very well and within which he had sheltered many times with his father's warriors when they were out on a hunt and caught in a thunderstorm. It was in this cave that Zwangezwi had played with his half-brothers Vivimpi and Bekizwe only three summers ago before both the elder boys were drowned in a canoe accident a year later. Inside the cave were many paintings of animals and men, painted by the Little Yellow Ones, the Bushmen, years and years ago. Some of the human figures were done in white, representing the mysterious race called the Strange Ones—a race of White men who held the Black Tribes in slavery for hundreds of years. It was to this cave, full of memories of the past, that Zwangezwi led the Vamangwe girl Mulinda, and there he unrolled the leopard skin he had been carrying behind his shield and spread it on the sandy floor. He pulled the girl down beside him. To his great surprise he found she was crying and shaking all over like a sapling in a storm.

"Hau!" he exclaimed. "What is the matter, Oh Mulinda? Why are you crying like a scolded child?"

"My Prince," she sobbed, "let us go from here."

"Why girl? Did not your brother Vamba tell you to come here with me? Did he not promise to keep our secret and let no-one know about what we are going to do?"

"He did," she wept. "But it is not . . . you see . . . Vamba is not what he seems to be . . . he is your father's . . ." Her voice broke and her sobs were loud in the dark brooding interior of the cave.

"He is my father's what?" demanded the young man.

"Vamba, my brother, is your father's . . . great enemy!"

"Aieeee! That is a lot of nonsense Mulinda. Vamba is my closest and dearest friend and he is my father's best witchdoctor. He even saved me from a wounded warthog only last year. He is the most trustworthy counsellor my father has and he is more loyal to my father than all his Nguni Indunas put together. How dare you call your own brother my father's enemy?"

"Believe me, Prince, believe . . ."

"Ahhhhh!" laughed Zwangezwi. "So Malangabi, my old friend, was right when he said that you women start talking a lot of nonsense when you are on fire with desire. You are ablaze with the great longing for me, Oh my stolen love, so you have begun to talk all sorts of nonsense. Now, now, come to me and let me put the fire out." So saying, he seized the girl roughly by the shoulders and all but wiped her lips off her face in one great clumsy kiss. Then he remembered what his old friend the rascally Induna, veteran Malangabi, always told him that he should do when one day he got an intombi in his arms. He started showering the girl's lips, neck and breasts under a rain of what he fondly thought were kisses. He proceeded to caress her with rather clumsy heavy-handed, self-conscious movements of his unsteady, calloused hands until at last, more by nature than from anything he did, Mulinda became so heated that she drew him to her with a short sob . . .

Eventually Zwangezwi released the limp form of the girl and sat up, dazed, shocked, and very thoroughly frightened. His head was swimming and he felt like vomiting . . . but most of all he felt like leaping to his feet and running for dear life. "Why . . ." he thought, "why, I never thought it felt like this . . . I wish it had not happened . . . I . . . I am so scared, so ashamed . . . I." Then he remembered an old tribal saying: Labo abazama ukuwela umfula Wo tando bese bancane badibana ne zimanga nga pesheya (they who cross the river of love while still young will always meet very nasty surprises beyond it).

Zwangezwi was soon regretting his boyish curiosity. He began to feel very tired and in spite of his valiant efforts to keep his eyes open he slipped away into the valley of sleep in broad daylight—which is a very shameful thing indeed to happen to a warrior.

He was roughly awakened by the girl, whose voice was edged with fear and horror. "My Prince, four times have I tried to awaken you. Wake up, for your mother's sake, wake up . . . they are coming to kill you!"

Although still dazed, the young man seized his two spears as a tall figure loomed in the entrance of the cave—a featureless silhouette against the blazing silver sky. Instinctively and with deadly accuracy, Prince Zwangezwi hurled his first spear and had the satisfaction of hearing it thud home into the armed intruder's chest.

A group of figures, all heavily armed, suddenly burst into view as the first man sagged to his knees. A hail of spears ripped into the chest and belly of the young Prince even as he raised his arm to throw his second spear. Zwangezwi fell backwards, treacherously and mortally wounded, but no cry escaped his lips. The son of Malandela was too brave to cry out when struck down by lowborn and cowardly curs.

As his murderers trooped into the cave and stood looking at him, Zwangezwi smiled contemptuously. He smiled even though he saw the shafts of the long lion-spears protruding from his body; he smiled although he was bathed in the seas of red agony. He smiled as he recognised each one of his assailants—even the man he admired, worshipped and for whom he would gladly have laid down his life—the man his father also trusted without question: Vamba Nyaloti, the brother of the woman Mulinda.

As the tall, thin, hardened Vamba came closer, Zwangezwi asked softly and calmly: "Why did you do this to me, my dear friend, why?"

Vamba's reply was cold and steady. "Because, my friend, you are the son of Malandela and you were the heir to the throne, which I am anxious to have when your father dies. For many years I have been ingratiating myself with your father and the rest of the lesser chiefs of the land of your nation, gaining their confidence and sometimes playing one against the other."

"But why . . . you need not have gone to all this trouble. I would gladly have shared the kingdom with you after my father's death."

"I know you would have, Oh gentle youth," said Vamba quietly. "Your friendship has been the most genuine I ever had. But the same I am playing for the sake of my tribe is one in which I must be utterly ruthless, one in which I must recognise neither friend nor relative."

"Now I know," said the fast-dying prince. "Now I know that you killed my two elder half-brothers two years ago—you whom my father trusts with his life."

"Yes, I gave your brothers a new canoe as a present, but the canoe had a hole just below the waterline when carrying a weight. This hole I had loosely covered with a wild gum which melts in water. I further urged your stupid brothers to give the canoe a good tryout by venturing to the middle of the Zambezi. When they got there they drank far too much of the Zambezi . . ."

"So you want to make your tribe great once again by taking over the Nguni, after having also killed my father . . ."

"Yea-ha!" agreed Vamba. "I want to lift my people, the Vamangwe, to the greatness that once was theirs. I intend to seize the Nguni High Seat and replace all Malandela's Indunas with Vamangwe; I shall then abolish the name Nguni and replace it with Vamangwe."

"You shall do nothing of the kind," said Zwangezwi with a smile. "Someone will come who will put a stop to your murderous intentions . . . Beware of the Blind God who Walks!" With a smile of pity and pure contentment on his lips, the son of Malandela died. He died having had the satisfaction of seeing fear in the eyes of Vamba and his four followers when he uttered his last words.

It was one of Vamba's followers, a burly rascal called Mukingo, whose body was one mass of Vamangwe tribal scars and who was blind in one eye, who broke the silence: "What is this . . . this rubbish about a god who walks?"

"It is just a mere old legend, Oh Mukingo," replied another man, a withered old charlatan called Luva, who always wore the jackal skin headdress and loinskin of a witchdoctor-storyteller. "It is said that a lost immortal roams the land and many who claim to have seen him say his eyeballs are completely white and he cannot see. But he is as tall as a mopani tree and as strong as a thousand elephants. It is said that although he is blind he can fight, swim and dance like a normal man. It is said that he is always accompanied by three very beautiful girls, his daughters, girls who live only for their father and who never look at any other man . . ."

"They would look at me after I have finished with them," growled Mukingo savagely. "I can conquer any girl on earth, no matter how proud and beautiful she is . . ."

"Be silent you fools!" cried Vamba. "There is no such thing as an immortal. Come on, take your spears out of this dog's body and let us close the entrance with rocks."

"You are nervous, Oh great Vamba," sneered Mukingo. "Could it be that you are frightened?"

Vamba spun around and faced Mukingo, his right hand streaking to his mpanga hanging at his side. He actually half-drew the lethal blade, but pushed it back abruptly into the scabbard when Mukingo laughed evilly in his face. "One day I shall kill you . . ."

"One day you can go and relieve your bowels over a prickly thorn bush," sneered Mukingo. "The day shall never dawn when a half-man like you kills me."

Vamba's mpanga left its scabbard in a hissing blur of speed, but the burly Mukingo easily sidestepped and kicked the weapon out of Vamba's hand. "Forget your girlish anger, you vile combination of both man and woman. Were it not for your brilliance in laying secret and treacherous plots, I would have killed you long ago and taken over leadership of the Vamangwe. And you know you need me to sire the children which the people think are yours, in order to cover up your shame, you miserable freak."

Vamba's eyes glittered with cold anger and great bitterness. He knew that Mukingo was right; he knew he could never dare kill his cousin on whom he depended for many things. Vamba was not a normal man and the only people who knew this were the four men with him in the cave—Mukingo, Luva, Dombozo and Mutumbi—and these men he had sworn to secrecy. Furthermore, he kept these men constantly by his side and under his eyes to prevent his secret from leaking out. When the High Chief of the Nguni, Malandela, presented Vamba with a great kraal and three buxum Nguni maidens for wives, he asked Mukingo who very closely resembled him in features, to take the three women secretly and beget children for him. Vamba knew that if he killed Mukingo, who was very dear to the hearts of his other three friends, they would expose his shame to the world in revenge. In fact, Vamba knew very well that as soon as he reached his life's objective of lifting the Vamangwe to greatness once more, the very men who called themselves his friends would kill him and put the popular Mukingo in his place. Love of his tribe, however, outshone all else in Vamba's heart and he was determined to make the Vamangwe great even though he knew he would never live long enough to enjoy the ripe fruits of his labours.

His deformity was the major cause of his ruthlessness. He bitterly hated the world for what it had done to him and it was even whispered that he had killed his own father and cut off his beautiful mother's left hand as punishment for having brought him in such a state into this cruel world.

So, with the tears of bitterness stinging his eyes, Vamba retrieved his mpanga and sheathed it slowly. Then he said with his usual cold calmness: "Come on, all of you, take your spears out of this dead thing and let us go."

"Wait but a moment, Oh Vamba," said the old man Luva. "We must first cut off both his hands, and take out his liver too—you know why we need these things."

"Get on with it then, but be quick," snapped Vamba. "We do not have all day."

Luva slashed off both the dead Zwangezwi's hands and then, while Mukingo, Dombozo and Mutumbi tore out their spears and licked off the blood to prevent his ghost from haunting their dreams, the old man cut the body on the left side to extract the liver. It was then that Mulinda, who had fainted when Zwangezwi was struck down, recovered consciousness and screamed. Vamba took two strides to where his sister crouched, screaming at the top of her voice, and pulled the trembling girl to her feet. He struck her cruelly on the mouth and said: "Nyerera, be quiet you slut, keep your wide mouth closed!" Then he pushed her roughly out of the cave.

"Vamba . . ." called the girl as he turned to go back into the cave. He turned and she said: "You had better kill me too, because if you don't I shall betray you—I shall expose you for the treacherous, cowardly murderer you are!"

"You shall do what? You shall do what?" hissed Vamba icily.

"You have caused enough bloodshed and evil in this world, Vamba. You killed father and you tortured mother. You caused three great wars in the land. You have murdered, or brought about the murder, of a thousand innocent people in the name of the Vamangwe tribe. Today you have killed an innocent boy who adored you and you are planning to murder his father as well. You used me as a decoy to lure him to his death. You are a foul, black-hearted beast Vamba, and I thank the Tree of Life you can never beget any children, otherwise the world would be overrun by other inhuman freaks like yourself!"

"Did you call me an inhuman freak Mulinda?" asked Vamba. "Did I hear you, my sister, calling me an inhuman freak?"

"Vamba," said the girl, smiling through the blood that still streamed from her lips, "I, Mulinda, your eldest sister, call you a monstrous, inhuman freak whom the High Gods cursed from birth and whose only place is in the grave."

"I shall kill you for that!"

"Go on, you cowardly, treacherous half-man!" screamed the girl. "Kill me. Kill me and have done with it, you cur! One more murder should not worry you."

Vamba drew his mpanga with the speed of a striking serpent and would have run the girl through with it, had not Mukingo seized his arm and pinned it behind his back. "There are laws that even a deformed mongrel like you must obey, and one of them is that you must not spill the blood of your own kin. You can strangle your sister, or you can throw her into the Zambezi if you wish. But you are not allowed to stab her, you monstrous freak."

"So be it," cried Vamba. "We shall not shed her blood, but we shall tie her hand and foot and leave her with her lover in the cave."

* * * * *

At last the mouth of the cave was securely sealed with rocks and heavy boulders and the men turned to go, leaving Mulinda alive and alone in the dark cave with two dead bodies for company. Vamba went first, proud and aloof, and then followed Mukingo who had paused to relieve a capacious bladder against the sealed entrance of the cave. Next followed Luva, chuckling loudly to himself as was his habit, and with the hands and the liver of Zwangezwi in the small pouch slung over his shoulder. Then, last of all went the unnatural pair, the fat girlish youth named Dombozo and the middle-aged man Mutumbi. Mutumbi and Dombozo were more than just friends and comrades in evil; they really loved each other in more senses than one and it was whispered that Mutumbi had deserted his kraal and two wives to be beside Dombozo always.

A deep silence claimed the forest once more and two butterflies chased each other past the pile of rocks that sealed the mouth of the cave in which two dead bodies lay at the feet of a young girl tied hand and foot, propped up against a wall decorated by Bushmen. She was doomed to a slow death by suffocation, thirst and hunger.

Evil were the deeds of Vamba, the son of Nyaloti and Luojoyo, in the land of the Nguni. Treacherous and vile were his plots against the mighty Malandela! But do not the Ancient Ones say that "There is no rascal, however clever, who can be so clever as to lick the small of his own back"? Vamba was a clever man, yes he was more clever than the fabled jackal that stole the skin off the Sun Elephant. But he was not clever enough to know that the deed of dark and cowardly murder had been seen by somebody hiding in the forest, and that someone was a tall, dark-brown beautiful woman with only one hand, and with a stump where the left hand had been cut off many years previously. This woman was none other than Luojoyo, Vamba's own mother.

“I, THE IMMORTAL . . .”

THE great kudu bull was wounded, but pain only made him run faster. Like the mother of the Seven Winds herself, he ran through the forest with the long-legged huntresses in full cry after him. He crashed through the bushes and jumped over fallen trees; he leapt like the Star Impala itself over a rush-fringed stream. Fear gave strength to his slowly weakening legs and he ran blindly through the trees—on and on, until a treacherous tendril twined itself about his horns as he flashed past an old parasite-vine smothered ebony tree. Down he went on his forelegs, struggling desperately to free his horns from the clinging vine. The two human females, who had chased the kudu over a great distance without tiring, closed in on the stricken animal and the elder and taller of the two sent a long-shafted arrow deep into the animal's heart.

“Hey-ya!” she cried. “We got him at last, Mvurayakucha, we got him. But, Oh my father, did the brute run!”

“He must be the father of all kudus to be able to run so fast, with one of your arrows in him, Oh my sister Luanaledi! But let us make haste and cut parts off him to take to our dear father and . . . Look, Oh my sister, look over there!”

“Now, by the golden breasts of my mother Watamaraka,” cried the elder of the two females, following her sister's pointing finger. “Is that woman a mad one?”

The two tall and perfectly moulded young females forgot the kudu at their feet and stood looking at the strange thing taking place at the base of a mighty outcrop of rock that reached into the silver skies, about a hundred paces from where they stood.

A lone woman who seemed to have only one hand was trying desperately to move some rocks at the base of the huge formation. But the rocks were far too heavy for her and she failed again and again. Now and then she would fling herself on the ground and roll about in the long grass, beating the ground with her one hand and crying to the high heavens.

“I smell evil, Mvurayakucha,” said the older huntress. “Come.”

The two young huntresses ran to the struggling woman and the elder of the two, Luanaledi, placed a gentle hand on the woman's shoulder and said: “What is the matter, Oh respected woman?” The woman tried to speak, but only hoarse animal sounds escaped her parted lips and the young huntress realised that she was totally unable to speak—she was dumb. The woman gestured frantically and pointed again and again to the rocks she had been trying vainly to move.

“My sister,” cried the younger of the two sisters, “I know why this woman is trying to move these stones. A girl is entombed alive in a cave under these rocks, with two dead males. This woman is the mother of the girl in there and she has been trying since yesterday to free her. I can read her thoughts, Luanaledi, and I can get those of the entombed girl as well. Unless we move these rocks and free her, she will be dead in a few moments.

The elder of the two voodoo-sisters suddenly drew herself proudly erect in front of the sealed cave, her breasts heaved and her nostrils dilated as she said in a harsh and savage voice: "In the name of my mother, the golden goddess Watamaraka, and in the name of our father, the mighty Lumukanda, and also in the name of my father's other wife, Ninavanhu-Ma, the Goddess of Creation, I, Luanaledi, the Heavenly River of Stars, command you inanimate stones to tumble to the ground."

Then she stepped back, dragging the frantic woman with her and all three stood at a safe distance and watched. For a while nothing happened, then there came a faint crackling sound as a rock at the bottom felt a stress. This was followed almost immediately by a small thundering rockslide as the stones came tumbling to the ground, leaving half the cave mouth open.

The younger girl, Mvurayakucha, leapt inside, disappeared into the dark interior of the cave. A few moments later she re-appeared, carrying the dark form of the unconscious Mulinda in her arms like a child and passed her burden through the aperture to Luanaledi before scrambling out herself.

* * * * *

Mulinda regained consciousness and found she was lying on her back under a tree and that a whispering breeze was fanning her face, which felt as if it had been bathed with water from the stream nearby. The first person she saw sitting next to her was Luojoyo, her mother, who suddenly burst into tears when her daughter opened her eyes.

"Mother," breathed Mulinda. But Luojoyo placed her finger on her daughter's lips for silence and pointed to something to her left. The girl turned her head and saw a very unusual sight. Two slender girls armed with bows and arrows in ornate quivers, with their backs to her, were busy cutting pieces out of the carcass of a buck lying in the tall grass. The over-perfect beauty of the bodies of the two girls left Mulinda breathless and filled her heart with a cold creeping fear. "Who are they Maie?" she whispered.

Luojoyo made the sign of "spirit" with her fingers. She touched the tip of her small finger with that of her thumb, holding her hand palm downwards. Then she brought together the tips of her forefinger and thumb, palm upwards, to indicate 'virgin', followed by the simple sign for 'two'.

"Two spirit virgins?" asked Mulinda. "I am afraid, Oh my mother."

Luojoyo smiled and patted her daughter's ebony-black shoulders, and it was then that a strange thing happened. The two girls suddenly dropped their mpangas and stood perfectly still, as if listening. Then both of them burst into action—they dragged the carcass into the shelter of a dense bush. The one went to retrieve the two mpangas while the other approached Mulinda and her mother. She beckoned them to follow her and led them behind the same dense bush in which they had hidden the kudu carcass. Then they all settled on their stomachs in deadly silence.

Soon the bushes moved directly opposite the hidden female watchers, across the grassy treeless glade. A man came into view—a man tall, thin and handsome in a hard, cruel way, a man whom Luojoyo knew better than he knew himself and whom Mulinda had called a monstrous freak. Vamba, the son of Luojoyo, was followed by two other men who actually walked hand in hand and whom Mulinda recognised as Dombozo and Mutumbi. Then something occurred that left both Mulinda and her mother breathless: A woman came into view closely followed by Mukingo and this woman had her hair done up in the towering cylindrical sicolo hairstyle of the Nguni Royal Women. It was Nolizwa, the Fifth High Wife of the Nguni King, Malandela.

"Foul traitress," whispered Mulinda hoarsely. "So she too, who is the favourite wife of Malandela is among those who plot against the High King and the Nguni nation."

There was a loud shout from the lips of all the plotters when they discovered that the rocks sealing the cave at the base of the huge outcrop had been moved. Mukingo went into the cave and then came out again announcing that the girl Mulinda had been—spirited away.

"Now, Mvurayakucha," whispered the elder of the two voodoo-virgins, "now, my dear sister, now!"

The younger girl jumped to her feet and sent three arrows humming across the glade at the plotters. One arrow caught Dombozo in the left thigh and, full of fear and pain, he fell to the ground with a loud wail. The other two arrows thudded into the chest of Mutumbi as he whirled round to help his friend. So well did she shoot that both shafts were buried up to the feathers in Mutumbi's heart. Vamba and Mukingo leapt like wild impala and made off into the forest. But just as Mukingo vanished among the trees Mvurayakucha playfully, and with voodoo accuracy, placed two long arrows in his shiny black buttocks, one in each. Mukingo howled with pain, and made off into the depths of the forest with the two arrows protruding like two slim stiff wagging tails.

But the fat woman Nolizwa was not destined to escape, because she had only run a few paces when she tripped over a stone and fell heavily on her belly with a hoarse shriek. Mvurayakucha drew back the string of her bow to send an arrow through the woman. But her sister Luanaledi restrained her: "No, no, we want her alive, for the pot."

As she struggled painfully and breathlessly to her feet, the treacherous wife of the High King of the Nguni saw two slender and fantastically beautiful girls running towards her. They were laughing as they ran and both of them had bows in their hands. As they came closer Nolizwa saw that they both had the same expression of fiendish anticipation on their faces. This Nolizwa did not like at all and she gave vent to her feelings in a hoarse scream of fear:

"Help! Help me, Mukingo, come back and save me!"

But nobody came to her assistance as the two girls seized her and tore off her long skin skirt, her necklace and bracelets.

"Aaaah!" breathed the younger of the two girls. "Oh just look at her, Luanaledi, isn't she the most darling cow you have ever seen?"

"She is just fit for the pot, my sister," sighed the elder girl. "Just feel her thighs and her buttocks—nice, fat, well-fleshed and soft—the kind that just melts in your mouth; just asking to be cooked."

"Please, cow, do you mind if I have a small foretaste?" pleaded the younger girl to Nolizwa. But the woman was too paralysed by fear, horror and utter disbelief to reply, so Mvurayakucha took her silence for assent and sank her sharp filed teeth into the rolling mass of flesh that was Nolizwa's left buttock. The old woman sank to the ground in a dead faint.

Meanwhile Dombozo, who had fallen with the arrow in his thigh, had regained consciousness and crawled, or rather dragged, himself along the ground into the safety of the forest. From there he watched the two strange girls revive Nolizwa and push her roughly in the back as one does a cow, urging her towards the forest where they were joined by the other two women whom he recognised as Mulinda and her mother. Dombozo knew he was the only member of Vamba's band who had been able to see their strange assailants and who would be able to recognise them in future. He was the only one who knew that the girl Mulinda had been rescued from the cave, and that she was a danger to all of them as long as she lived. Dombozo tore the arrow out of his thigh and tried to stanch the flow of blood with green leaves, but in vain. He then urinated on the ground and scooped up the wet earth and plastered it on the wound, gritting his teeth and pressing the dirt right in regardless of the excruciating pain. Then he started limping slowly, painfully through the forest—he had to tell Vamba—to warn him quickly.

Suddenly a great lion bounded into view about thirty paces behind him and with a loud wail the young man ran blindly through the forest with the battle-scarred old man-eater in hot pursuit. The lion, who had been worsted in a savage battle with a young rival only a few days before, saw in Dombozo an object on which to vent his murderous anger and was determined to pursue him to the very frontiers of Eternity. However, with his bad limp, he was hardly doing a better speed than Dombozo.

The angry lion pursued the wounded youth through the forest until well past midday and slowly the distance between them lessened as Dombozo grew weaker from loss of blood. And then, just as he came to the stream he and the others had forded earlier that morning, he happened to cast a pain-misted glance downstream and saw Vamba with a strong party of armed Vamangwe warriors about to cross the stream on their way back in search of the mysterious attackers who had caused the proud Vamba to turn and run for his life earlier that day.

Dombozo raised his voice and called out as loud as he could: "Vamba! Vaaaambaaaa! Listen to me!" The distant men paused in midstream and looked in his direction and a voice floated faintly to his ears across the great distance:

"What is it, Dombozo?"

"Listen to me . . . a lion is after me . . . I havn't much time . . . I saw your sister . . . she is alive . . . and she and her mother and Nolizwa have been taken away . . . by two female cannibals . . .!"

As Dombozo finished speaking he was overrun by the lion who promptly tore his left shoulder from his body. A loud scream of fear and agony passed through his throat before his neck was broken. The lion dragged him behind a bush and for a long time there was the dull crunch of breaking bones and the sounds of ferocious munching—then a loud belch and . . . silence.

* * * * *

Nolizwa's face was a dark mask of pure horror. She could not believe what her ears were telling her. These incredibly beautiful girls, carrying bows and quivers, wearing the briefest of loinskins, were actually telling her again that they were taking her to their father for his dinner the next day. Nolizwa had heard about cannibals, many times, but had never met any before. And any doubts she may have had about the two girls were dispelled by the pain in her left buttock. Why, they had even given the meat from the kudu to Mulinda and her mother, who were following behind at a respectful distance with fear written all over their faces.

There was only one small question she wished to ask: "Why do you want to eat me alone—why not those two behind us as well?"

Mvurayakucha answered crisply: "We only eat evil people and you are one of them. We are not going to eat Mulinda and her mother; we are taking them to my father for safety. And if it is any consolation to you we shall not rest until we have eaten every one of those of your evil band who escaped today. We have found the best way to rid the world of evil pests such as yourself, is to eat them. And we have also found that the more evil a man's or a woman's character, the more delicious the stew he or she turns out to be. Do you understand me, Oh lovely midday meal?"

"After we have had as much of you as we can," announced Luanaledi, very pleasantly, "we shall take your skull and some of your stew and send it to Vamba as a warning. We tolerate no murderers and thieves near where we happen to be, so it is the pot for you tomorrow, my fat chicken."

After that it was Mulinda who asked a question in her soft, gentle voice: "Tell me, my sisters, who or what are you—to what tribe do you belong?"

"We belong to no tribe and we, together with the youngest one at home, are the daughters of one man by the most unusual mothers in all creation. Our father is a man who has lived longer than certain mountains and who has seen more evil on this earth than a million old men. We are all ageless and death will never touch us. We are known as the Lost Immortals."

* * * * *

My two eldest daughters, Luanaledi (River of Stars) and Mvurayakucha (Morning Dew), entered the hut in which I was sitting with the third joy of my sightless eyes, their youngest sister Mbaliyamswira (Flower of Passion), listening to her singing 'The Song of the Day Star' in her soft girlish voice. Night had fallen and loud in our ears was the chirping of thousands of crickets in the long grass outside the kraal. I had never seen the girls who entered and knelt before me, but I asked them teasingly: "What troubles have you now brought me, Oh my children? What problems have you brought to add yet another wrinkle to this tired brow?"

"We have brought you great problems, Oh my lazy father," answered the eldest of the mischievous three. "We thought that if we hunted around for problems with which to plague you it would stimulate your over-ancient blood and add yet more grey to your deathless hair."

"We have brought you also an evil one to have for dinner," the younger one chirped. "But before we eat her she has a few questions to answer."

"That she will indeed do, my children," I said. "I believe in making my breakfasts bare their souls to me before I enjoy them."

"Oh father," cried Luanaledi, "the silly things you say! We have also brought two other females, father, a mother and her daughter. But they are good people and are not to be eaten."

"The only good people are those in the stewpot, my children, and no woman is ever truly good until she is in the soup, so to speak."

"Father," cried Luanaledi, "these are our guests—they need our help."

"I shall help them so long as they are willing to become my second helpings one day."

"Oh you impossible parent," cried Luanaledi. "Do you never think of anything else except eating people?"

"To be eaten is the only thing the human beings of this world are good for, my child," I replied. "Now if I were . . ."

"Father, please," pleaded Mvurayakucha, "the girl Mulinda is beginning to cry."

"Tell her to be quiet or she shall soon be crying on a spit! And you can bring forward the one we shall be having for dinner tomorrow. Let these old hands feel the tender flesh I shall soon be digesting. Now from you, oh dinner, I want a full confession of the sins of your youth before we broil you!"

"Here she is, Oh father. She is as fat as a thief's bundle and as scared as a monkey in a beerpot," said Luanaledi.

* * * * *

The ritual dinner was finished and Malandela's Fifth Queen had indeed made delicious eating. Great within me grew the longing to compliment the High Chief one day on his very tasty wife. Luanaledi wondered if all Nguni women made such a delicious meal, and we all decided to find out soon. Thus it was that two days later we were on our way to the land of the Nguni, by canoe down the Luangwa River. Mulinda and her mother travelled with us, huddled together in the stern of our Great Canoe. As I sat inside the skin-covered hut amidships, listening to my daughters' singing as they paddled down the river, I went over the story of the Vamangwe very carefully in my mind. It seemed that at the height of their power the Vamangwe had been a cruel and warlike tribe with the particularly unpleasant habit of making war on other tribes for no other reason than to get hundreds of male and female captives to sacrifice to their Leopard God.

At long last the Vamangwe had bitten off more than they could chew by daring to attack the formidable Lunda nation in the West. The Lunda had lashed back at the Vamangwe with the speed and ferocity so characteristic of them and had not only slaughtered the invading army to a man, but had pushed deep into Vamangwe territory and wiped out three-quarters of that hated tribe. The survivors of the Vamangwe, about eight thousand in all, had fled into the land of the Nguni some ten years previously and, because of their great skill in wood carving, spear making and preparation of medicine, the tribe had been granted a fraction of the vast land of the Nguni in which to settle, by the fierce and warlike High King Malandela.

But it seemed that the Vamangwe had no intention of living in peace and prosperity under Malandela. They wanted to take over and rule the entire Nguni nation. Now, because they were so few in number, they never stood a chance in open battle with either the Nguni or the Western Mambo supertribes. And the Vamangwe, led by an ambitious and fanatical creature called Vamba Nyaloti, had been fighting a secret and treacherous underground war against the unsuspecting Nguni. Their strategy consisted of secretly murdering the sons of the High Chief so that when that worthy died he would leave no heir to sit on the High Seat. It also involved removing some of the Nguni Indunas either by having them executed by Malandela through accusing them of plotting against him or of being wizards—or even arranging accidents in which the particular Induna would conveniently lose his life. This was all made possible by the simple fact that the High Chief Malandela greatly trusted the Vamangwe. In fact, he trusted them more than he trusted his own Nguni people.

His three personal witchdoctors, Vamba, Luva and a female called Luwamba, were Vamangwe tribespeople and it was these people who were busy murdering the foolish king's sons behind his back and who were already planning his own death.

Nolizwa, who had been Mukingo's secret lover, had been fully aware of the plot against the High Chief Malandela, her lawful husband. She had also been fully aware of the murders of Malandela's many sons over the period of five years; she had approved of them and had even helped in planning the murder of Zwangezwi. It was she who had thought of using the girl Mulinda to decoy the curious and woman-hungry Zwangezwi to his death. Other people in Malandela's kraal knew about the Vamangwe plot. But they were either too afraid to talk or they were too full of hatred of Malandela to care, because the High Chief of the Nguni, who was known by the nickname of 'Old Thundering Stomach' (he being consistently attacked by indigestion and flatulence) was not a popular chief. Unlike his brother Bekizwe who ruled the Western Mambo, Malandela was cruel, impulsive and utterly stubborn.

There were many Nguni who would have been happy to see Old Thundering Stomach overthrown and destroyed like the heartless dog he was. I was not at all surprised to find myself imagining Malandela inside my biggest stewpot. A fat, lecherous tyrant like him, who was stupid enough to trust a rat-like tribe like the Vamangwe, richly deserved to be eaten.

I wanted to meet Malandela and I wondered how one of his haunches would taste when roasted. It seemed as if the land of the Nguni was crawling with evil ones and I was quite sure many of them would find their way down my gullet before long. You may not know it yet, Oh Vamba, but one of these days you may find yourself ruling supreme in a big clay cooking pot, garrished with stewing yams and pot-herbs. I gradually developed a pleasant feeling around my stomach—a feeling born of anticipation.

THE land of the Nguni was deep in the swampland of sorrow, mourning together with its Chief the death of Zwangezwi and the disappearance of Nolizwa, who was one of the High Chief's favourite wives—in the great thousand-and-one seraglio of Malandela. The cornfields sprawled untended on the grassy plains while the young corn was ripening and being smothered by weeds and turning a sickly yellowish-green. People were allowed to milk their cows but once a day and eat but once a day, with the result that the people went half-hungry and the cows wandered through the pastures and forests with their udders almost bursting with milk. The Period of Mourning was going to last for a whole year and that meant that at the end of the year there would be a disastrous famine in the land of the Nguni and many people would die.

During the Period of Mourning, nobody was allowed to go to the river side to wash, to sweep a hut clean, to sing or to call out loudly. People were even forbidden to repair huts or stockades and all acts of love between men and women were most strictly forbidden. Hideously painted and masked Tribal Avengers prowled throughout the vast land, together with tens of thousands of Sacred Informers of both sexes, looking out for those who broke the Rules of Mourning. People were made to cut big holes in the grass walls of their huts so that the Tribal Avengers might peep into the huts to see that no couples were secretly mating inside. People spent many a sleepless night while Tribal Avengers prowled around kraals and peeped into huts ever so often. It soon became a daily occurrence for a man to find himself being spied upon by a female Sacred Informer while relieving his bowels behind his favourite thornbush. The grotesque masked heads of the Tribal Avengers and the red headbands and red feathers of the Sacred Informers began to haunt people's dreams. Starvation, sorrow and fear covered the tortured land like a rotting worm-infested kaross blanketing the body of an old chief, three months dead.

In cowardly endeavours to curry favour with Malandela, many people began spying upon their neighbours and sometimes telling lies about them, with the result that innocent people died at the hands of the Tribal Avengers and marauding bands of Malandela's warriors. It became an everyday occurrence for a man to get rid of a hated neighbour or a rival by simply whispering into the ear of a Sacred Informer that he had seen him break one of the Rules of Mourning. Anyone thus accused stood no chance; he or she was very often killed on the spot without a trial of any description.

Yes, these were the days of great sorrow and fear in the land of Malandela.

* * * * *

The long canoe nosed its way through the thick ncema rushes that bordered the mighty Luangwa River and I sensed the great joy that exploded like a falling star within the minds of my daughters. I could read the thoughts of every animal under the sun and I always loved listening in to the thoughts of my dear children. This day all of them were more than happy to leave the cramped canoe and they wanted one thing on such a hot day—to bathe in the cool waters of the ageless Luangwa.

“Aaaiee, no! You do not,” I said to them. “There will be no swimming until you have helped me build the kraal I want to have right here. So it is out of the canoe all three of you; go and cut as much thatch as you can.”

“But we never said we wanted to go swimming, Oh my father!” protested Mvurayakucha.

“No you did not say anything of the kind—but I can read your thoughts, remember.” At this I sensed angry resentment in their minds and one of them, the youngest, had a clear wish-picture of me being chewed by a crocodile in her little mind. We pulled the canoe well out of the water and with the exception of Luojoyo and Mulinda who remained behind to cook food for all of us, we set out to look for things essential in building a kraal—grass, logs and long pliant saplings.

Although the Tree of Life had deprived me of my eyesight out of spite and senseless revenge many, so many, years ago, I was not at all helpless—in fact I was much better off without it. I could not see the beauty of the green forest, but I could find my way through it much faster than a normal man. Although I could not see a man’s face I could see his soul, hear his thoughts and, if it came to fighting, could rout any dogs stupid enough to attack me—dogs on two feet that is. So, armed with an axe, I went into the dark forest and after a good half-day’s work I was hauling back to the site of our camp a great bundle of logs and trimmed saplings. My daughters had returned a few moments before with enough grass to build three big huts and a story of something terrible they had seen.

“They were all dead, Oh my father! Three women, a man, and about six of what we took to be his children. A whole family of them, all staked out in the clearing of their burnt-out kraal and all having been killed by stakes driven into their bellies. It was terrible, hideous, and utterly criminal.”

“But we found that not all of them had died father,” said another excitedly. “We found a young boy alive and hiding high up in a mopani tree; we had to climb up the tree to bring him down by force because he was so afraid of people as a result of what he had seen being done to his family. He runs like a buck as soon as anybody comes near him. He is here now—we brought him with us. But we had to tie him hand and foot to stop him from escaping.”

“Bring him to me, Oh my children, let me read what happened from his mind. Surely there is much evil in this land and we must stamp it out, quickly and utterly.”

The boy was brought to me and laid gently at my feet. I heard him whimper and try to struggle out of his bonds before I commanded him to sleep while I read his mind:

The boy’s father had been accused by a vengeful brother-in-law before the Tribal Avengers of having broken one of the Rules of Mourning laid upon the land by the lecherous tyrant Malandela, as a result of what he thought was a mysterious death of his son Zwangezwi. The brother-in-law had come at night with a troop of Tribal Avengers and openly accused the boy's father of milking his cows twice a day for several days. The boy's father had pleaded that he had done this to save his sick First Wife from dying of hunger. She had been ill and could take nothing but fresh milk now and again, and because the milk in the kraal had gone quickly sour in the great heat, the boy's father had no alternative but to milk once again, or have his already weakened wife die before his eyes. The pitiless Avengers had killed his father and three wives, including the accuser's sister, together with all the other children, except the boy Mukombe who had escaped and climbed into a tree. From his perch in the tall tree the boy had seen his parents, brothers and sisters die, had heard their agonising screams, and had also seen his already rich but thieving uncle help himself to his father's many head of cattle.

"My daughters," I shouted, "my soul is ablaze with anger. We have all sworn to wipe out evil from this land; we have sworn to eat every evil man and woman off the face of this country and it looks like we are going to be well-fed. You, Mvurayakucha, come with me with your bow and your quiver full of arrows and you, Luanaledi, shall help Mbaliyamswira and Mulinda in building the huts, while Luojoyo can look after Mukombe. Someone find me my skull headdress and fingerbone necklace and axe. Tonight the man-eater Lumukanda shall attack the kraal of the man who murdered the parents of Mukombe!"

"I do not agree, Oh my father," said Luanaledi rebelliously. "I do not want to be left behind while you and Mvurayakucha have all the excitement. We do not need to build a kraal at all here. All we have to do is attack the kraal of Mukombe's uncle, stew him and have him for supper tonight, drive away his wives, take over his cattle—just like this!" and she snapped her long graceful fingers.

"All right, my eldest one, we shall do as you suggest."

* * * * *

Madondo, the son of Muti, was a man very pleased with himself. He showed it by guzzling copious draughts of thin mahewu sour porridge and by taking a great bite out of a goat's haunch that sat on a great gqoko meat tray at his side. Then he would pause between each bite, and drink and chew slowly while smiling happily to himself and pat his great stomach tenderly and very lovingly. Anyone who had just succeeded in removing a hated in-law, and acquired his cattle without as much as a fist fight, would have felt as Madondo was feeling at that moment. He had simply gone to a roving band of Tribal Avengers camped not far from his kraal and had told them that his brother-in-law had broken one of the Rules of Mourning. He had led the angry Avengers to his in-law's kraal and had accused him once more to his face this time. The result had been that he had got rid of him and his wives, Madondo's own sister included, and had acquired no less than ten head of cattle to add to his own herd of one hundred. Yes, the very fat son of Muti had good reason to be very pleased with himself. He was now sitting alone in his Great Hut, because although he had four beautiful wives, including one ebony black Vamangwe beauty with flashing light-brown eyes, and had managed—just managed—to beget three sturdy sons with his first wife and one girl with his second. Madondo was a man whose "lamp of virility" had been snuffed out by the wind of illness two years ago; he now had no need for women, except as cooks and slaves. In fact, he loathed the "detestable breasted things" as he always liked to refer to them.

So he sat alone, eating and drinking and grinning pleasantly to himself, as happy as a louse on a skin blanket. Suddenly the Vamangwe Third Wife stuck her shaven head into the entrance of his hut and said: "There are people to see you, Oh husband."

"People at this time of the night! Tell them to go away. Tell them I am asleep and that they must come back tomorrow."

The woman disappeared, but an unbelievably beautiful girl suddenly appeared in the entrance with a great bow with an arrow notched onto its string, just as Madondo was raising the goat's haunch to his lips with his mouth open to take a great bite.

"Who are . . ." demanded Madondo, but his angry question was cut short as a hissing arrow thudded into his open mouth to emerge behind his neck, closely followed by a second which sank to the feathers in his navel. "Die, you foul murdering son of a basenji cur, die and go deep into hell with the curses of Mukombe pursuing you."

"Hey-yi!" I cried, standing some distance outside the Great Hut of Madondo. "I did not want you to kill that man, Oh Mvurayakucha. I wanted to have him for supper tomorrow night, you stupid hot-headed brat!"

"This creature is far too foul in many ways to deserve the honour of going down your immortal gullet, Oh my father," snarled Luanaledi out of the darkness. "We must cut off his head and put it on a pointed stick and send it as a message and a warning to Vamba and Malandela."

We herded Madondo's terrified wives and sons into the Great Hut and made them sit down. I then said to them: "Listen all of you, the man you called your husband and your father was an evil man, cruel enough and pitiless enough to cause the death of an innocent man and his family. My daughters and myself are dedicated to destroying this type of evil utterly in this land. I know that one of you women actually praised your husband for this foul deed and that was you, Nomeva, his First Wife—I can see right through your guilty mind. So you and your sons are going to take some messages for me as punishment. You are going to take a message stick with your husband's head impaled on it to a man called Vamba Nyaloti, and your three sons are going to carry another message stick to no less a person than Malandela the dog, who calls himself the High King of this land. So I want all four of you to line up against the wall of the hut—do it now, stand up . . . come on, hurry up!"

The woman and her sons obeyed and I made them look right into my blind eyes, staring until their wretched minds were completely under my control. Then I opened one of the little gourds of voodoo medicine I always carry in my pouch and ordered them to take a small sip of the thick dirty-looking contents. This was the dread munyonji medicine which destroys a person's will and memory forever and which makes anyone forced to drink it nothing but a dazed puppet that obeys anything it is told to do by the one in whose power it is.

"Come now," I said to them, "listen to what I command you to do, you brainless puppets. First say this after me: 'We are nothing but puppets—We shall obey anything you say—We shall take your message to Vamba and Malandela'. Now repeat all of that!" This they solemnly did.

Meanwhile my daughters had been cutting message sticks, two thick green mopani poles, one of which was sharpened to a point on which to receive Madondo's head, with the arrow still in its open mouth.

On the first stick the girls had cut the following message: "Eagle.Proud. Look.Jackal.Own.Nest.Secret.Killer.In.Your.Kraal." On the other stick, the one with the point, the girls had cut: "Hyæna.Rotten.We.Watch.Day.Come.We. Immortal.Three.Female.One.Man.Old.Blind.You.Kill.Eat.Beast.Unclean.Curse. You.Killer.Cowardly.Deformed.Sterile.Father.Murderer."

After that we waited with great impatience for daybreak and when the first fires of the coming sun lit with a reddish glow the eastern sky, I sent my messengers on their way—having first fed them and smeared their naked bodies from head to foot with a white clay mixed with hippopotamus oil. We watched as the four naked figures vanished into the dark forest and it was then that Luanaledi asked me why I had smeared the woman and her sons with white clay.

"To scare the loinskin off any fool impudent enough to approach those four," I told her, "and to show everybody that the woman is not to be molested in any way until she comes back to me. Anyone who touches her will have a High Curse on his shoulders, as will anyone molesting the boys."

"She is very beautiful, my father," said Mvurayakucha. "When she comes back she will make you a willing and brainless slave who obeys all orders without question."

"I shall use her and the rest of those beauties in this kraal in my war on evil. The dog Madondo certainly knew how to choose his women. Come, let us also deprive the remainder of their memories and put them in our power forever—they are too valuable to be eaten."

* * * * *

Three days later we were comfortably settled in the kraal that had belonged to Madondo. I had sent my eldest daughter to the riverside to fetch Mulinda and her mother, as well as Mbaliyamswira and the orphan boy Mukombe. And now, while Madondo's wives Mamana, Muwaniwani and Lozana moved about like sleep-walkers, sweeping the kraals and huts clean and preparing a delicious midday meal, Mulinda sat under the day shelter with her mother, combing and plaiting her parent's hair, and I reclined in the great hut with my daughters, planning our next move against the evil ones in the land of the Nguni. The one thing uppermost in my mind was to get Malandela to lift the Rules of Mourning off his tortured land because, by strict Tribal Law, Malandela's son Zwangezwi was not fit to be mourned for a full six months; he had been murdered while breaking an old Tribal Custom, the breaking of which would have earned him death in any case. Also Malandela's "missing" wife Nolizwa, whom we had eaten, was not fit to be mourned at all, because she had been a traitress who had plotted against Malandela himself.

I was also painfully aware of the fact that Malandela was blissfully ignorant of all this, and I felt it my duty to go to his kraal as soon as possible and enlighten the fat fool on what was going on right under his nose—and to eat him if he was not prepared to mend his ways. Our problems, however, were solved for us by the appearance of another troop of roaming Tribal Avengers later that day, and when Mukombe, whom I had sent to spy upon the Avengers, came back and told us the "masked ones" were camping for the night near a small waterfall, I leapt to my feet and said to my daughters: "Come, my dear children, this makes the whole thing much easier! Go out there and tell Mulinda and the other women to make as much noise as they can—let them call out in loud voices and sing the most provocative songs they can think of. You, my daughters, must go to the stream near which those masked fools are encamped, jump into the water and swim about, and also make as much noise as you can. Then come back here and bring along with you claypots of water, and sing all the way as loudly as you can. Go now, find some claypots and be off, quickly."

"Father," cried Luanaledi, "do not be so excited. What must we do all this for?"

"We are breaking every one of the Rules of Mourning and if I know them, those masked idiots will soon come up here like a pack of mad hyænas, their spears thirsting for our blood and I want them to come here!"

"Oh you mad, sweet father, we shall have such fun with them! Come on my sister, let us go now," said Luanaledi.

To Mukombe I said: "Come boy, bring out as many milking pails and milk pots as you can and then go and bring the cattle in. After that I want you to milk every cow in the herd—do you understand?"

"Yes, Big Grandfather."

"I want you to whistle and shout while you milk the cows, do you hear?"

"Yes, I understand, Oh Big Grandfather."

The boy ran out of the hut to carry out my orders and I also sent Mbaliyamswira to go and call one of my puppets, Muwaniwani, the Vamangwe woman, into my hut. When she crawled into the hut I could not see her of course, but I could see her mind from which all memories had been wiped out forever and which now contained only a reflection of my own—yet from that I could still identify her as Muwaniwani.

"Is that you Muwaniwani?" I asked, quite unnecessarily.

"To be commanded, my lord," answered the zombie softly.

"Lead me out of the kraal and into the bush."

"As my lord commands."

Muwaniwani took my hand and led me out of the hut and the gate of the kraal. Anybody watching us would have mistaken us for a blind and helpless old man being led into the forest by his favourite concubine. "Now Muwaniwani," I said to her, "I want you to listen carefully to what I have to say. I am laying a trap for those fools who call themselves the Avengers. I wish to attract them to my kraal, do you understand? I am going to make love to you and you must laugh and giggle so that anyone passing here will come and investigate. As soon as the leader of the troop sees Luanaledi and Mvurayakucha breaking the Rule of Mourning that forbids bathing, he will send out scouts to trail the two girls and find out where they stay and what other laws are being broken hereabouts. I want those scouts to find you and me here, breaking the strictest Rule of Mourning—do you hear?"

"I hear and obey, my lord."

* * * * *

The honourable Leader of the Tribal Avengers of the Third Sacred Troop could not bring himself to believe what his eyes, together with those of his colleagues, were seeing. He blinked behind the slits of the heavy wooden mask covering his face and then he shaded his eyes against the blinding glare of the afternoon sun and blinked again. He turned to his young lieutenant at his side and said: "Tell me, Second Avenger, is what I am seeing just what I think it is?"

"It is, Oh mighty First Avenger," said the younger one. "Those sluts are deliberately breaking one of the Rules of Mourning, and insulting us with mating gestures into the bargain!"

"This I cannot make myself believe!" growled the Honourable Leader. "Such things only happen in a bad dream. Look again and tell me what you see."

The Second Avenger looked again and he saw that the two slender girls were swimming nearer to the bank where the masked and hideously painted troop of very surprised Avengers stood shoulder to shoulder like a row of ugly idols in a 'forbidden valley'. Both these girls were golden brown in colour and incredibly beautiful; the perfect shape of their lithe bodies was enough to take any man's breath away—any man, that is, except a Tribal Avenger, because these queer types were always shorn of their powers of fatherhood before being enlisted into the ranks of the 'Secret and Sacred Regiments of Tribal Avengers' and not one of them was able to appreciate and desire women.

One of the impudent girls swam closer to the bank and hurled a lump of mud with great accuracy into the open toothy mouth of the mask worn by the Second Avenger. "Aieeee!" shrieked the girl. "Come on, Oh my unmanly brothers, take those silly logs off your faces and get into the water—from here I can smell you need a bath!"

"Shall I kill the impious slut, High Leader?" asked the Second Avenger, lifting his spear, a monstrous thing whose head bristled with barbs and whose shaft was decorated with mysterious signs.

"Chaaa!" snapped the High Leader. "When those two harlots leave the water I want Avenger Ten and Avenger Three to trail them to their home. I shall teach them and the misbegotten dog who begot them to insult the Tribal Avengers. They shall soon wish they had never been born."

So the Avenger lowered his spear and watched angrily as the two girls left the water after hurling a stream of sacrilegious taunts at him and his followers. Then he saw the elder of the two girls turn on the opposite bank of the tree-shaded pool, and with hands clasped behind her head, she wriggled her hips most insultingly at the Avengers. As the two girls picked up their loinskins, dressed, and grabbed their water pots, the High Leader's voice rang out hoarsely: "Avengers Ten and Three—ford the stream and follow them!"

SKULL DRUM USED IN MACABRE MA-ITI RITES

BEHOLD THE CRUEL

SOME time later, after sunset, Avengers Ten and Three returned to their camp and knelt before their leader. "Well?" he asked.

Avenger Ten spoke: "I . . . we . . . do not understand it, Honourable One. Either the people of that kraal are as mad as the Heavenly Hag or they are just asking to be executed. I have never seen anything like it in all my life."

"What are they doing? Give me a full and clear report of what you saw and heard because at midnight we must attack that kraal and kill every living thing in it!"

"We trailed the girls to this lonely kraal and we found that it is the only kraal in an uninhabited wilderness. Just before we came in sight of the kraal we heard sounds of laughter behind a bush and both Avenger Three and myself crept forward to investigate. To our great surprise we found an elderly man, who seemed to be blind in both eyes, with a young Vamangwe woman in the bush and making violent love to her. We departed silently and continued trailing the two girls, following them to within twenty paces of the gate of the stockade that surrounds their kraal. We heard loud voices come from within the stockade—vulgar songs sung by women, at the top of their voices, and loud calls and shrill laughter. Then we saw a young boy about ten or twelve summers old, milking one cow after another in the cattle pen and when we came back, we saw the old man and the Vamangwe girl going back to their kraal laughing as if they were attending a lunatic's wedding."

"Did they see you?" asked the leader.

"No Great One, we kept to the trees," said the Tenth Avenger.

"Hey-ya!" growled the leader. "We must go at midnight and kill those mad people. We cannot tolerate such flagrant breaches of the holiest laws of our fathers. That grey-bearded madman and his daughters must die!"

"Give me your ear, Honourable Leader," said the Third Avenger. "I have something to tell you which you must know. That kraal has something very wrong about it—something that doesn't make sense."

"You are well known for your powers of observation, Third Avenger," said the leader. "Tell us more about what you think is wrong with the kraal."

"I will, Oh High One. First let us take the two girls who taunted us at the pool over there. Did any of you notice something very strange about them?"

"No, we did not," said the High Leader, speaking for the rest of the Avengers. "It is best that you tell us, observant one."

"Great One, and you my brother Avengers, today we were not dealing with ordinary law-breakers. We were dealing with something that is so strange and awesome you will find it very hard to believe when I tell you. But first, let me say that I think we are being deliberately lured into that kraal. Someone or something utterly alien and powerful wants us to go into that kraal—but for what purpose I do not know."

"What?" cried the leader. "What makes you think that? If you were an ordinary man and not a well-trained Avenger I would say you were dreaming, Oh Third One."

"Listen to me, please. First of all, do you not think it very strange that we, who are feared and well known and revered by every tribe under the sun, should suddenly find ourselves taunted and insulted by two mere girls? The Secret and Sacred Regiments of Tribal Avengers have been in existence for a thousand years and never once in history has a Tribal Avenger been insulted! Even the maddest of mad chiefs thinks twice before he so much as tries to offend us in any way. Even Malandela, that cruel and blustering lecher, is terribly scared of us Avengers.

"Suddenly we find ourselves being insulted by mere girls, or what looks like mere girls, who are so unafraid of us that they make no effort whatsoever to escape afterwards. They sauntered slowly to their kraal as if wanting us to follow them. Tell me, my brothers; does all this not seem strange to you? Then, while we were still trailing the two girls, we came upon something also very unusual—an elderly blind giant and a young woman making love noisily in a clump of bushes, the very clump of bushes beside which the girls passed. Would a man as dignified as that old grey-haired one sink so low as to act thus with a female next to a footpath where any passers-by might see him?

"And the evil songs sung by the women in the kraal and the little boy senselessly milking cow after cow. All that was intended to lure us into that kraal. Those two girls were the first to kindle the fires of suspicion in my breast. They were too beautiful to face, too well moulded in body to be human. And their ears were not at all pierced. They had no tribal scars on their bodies, so they are neither Vamangwe nor Nguni—they just belong to no tribe under the sun. Believe me, when I saw that blind man with the Vamangwe woman in the bush, my suspicions were confirmed. I know who that old man and those girls are. That old man is none other than the legendary Lost Immortal whom the Supreme Leaders always tell us to watch out for. He must have taken over the kraal for some reason and . . ."

"And we must find out what he wants us for" growled the leader. "We are not here to play games either with men or immortals. Come on, men, follow me."

Now, to be an Avenger one had to be brave enough to face anything under the sun, be it natural or supernatural. One had to be brave enough to be able to walk into haunted kraals without fear—to tell even the most ugly ghost to pack up and get out. Avengers feared nothing under the sun, because they served Right, Truth and Justice, and the very fact that they were dedicated to rooting out and destroying all manner of evil gave them strength and courage denied to most men.

* * * * *

We sensed the Avengers as they slowly but surely surrounded our kraal. We heard their thoughts as each one of them tightened his grip on his charmed "Spear of Justice". Then we all went out into the star-sprayed night to welcome the High Leader who was about to enter our kraal alone and armed only with his heavy and skilfully carved "Club of Execution".

"I see you, Oh Avenger," I said to him as I sensed him entering the open gate. "I see you in peace and I see you again. I know that your men have surrounded the kraal. Tell them to lay down their arms and to come into the kraal in peace."

"You are the blind 'Lost Immortal' and we know you have sent your daughters to try and entice us into this kraal by pretending to be law-breakers," said the leader in matter-of-fact tones.

"How clever you are, Oh masked one," cried Luanaledi.

"Be silent, Luanaledi," I said. "Be silent and go and light the fire in the centre of the kraal."

The one hundred and three Avengers trooped in. I heard the clatter of metal as they piled their spears and axes near the gate of the stockade before they went to sit around the roaring fire. Then I called out to Muwaniwani and the other two zombies to bring out five great pots of beer and fifty smaller pots, for the Avengers to drink. When the beer was brought, I took a deep draught out of each pot as the law dictates all hosts should do before passing the beer on to their guests. There were sounds of deep drinking as the pots were passed from man to man down the lines.

The Avengers had raised their masks a little in order to drink, but not so much as to reveal fully their features which were lost in darkness under the heavy masks fringed with lion's mane. When all had finished drinking, the leader said: "Siyabonga . . ." (Hail, Lord, we thank you.)

Then I rose to my feet and addressed them as follows: "My sons, Sacred Avengers dedicated to the destruction of evil, I greet you. I, the Lost Immortal, whose heart is weary of life and whose knees are tired of wandering in the endless land and among tribes and nations, am greeting you this night. You are here because I wanted you to be here and to sit around me as you are sitting now listening to what I have to tell you. My sons, I have come into this land because thousands of people are suffering and hundreds have been murdered. The cries of the innocent sufferers fetched me from far away and today I am here—to crush to the ground the evil ones who, through their stupidity and ambition and greed, threaten the very existence of the two great divisions of the Mambo nation, the Nguni and the Western Mambo. My sons, I beg you to incline your heads and to listen to what I have to tell you."

I went on to tell them what I knew about Vamba, Zwangezwi and Mulinda. I told them as clearly as I could about the treachery planned against the High King Malandela and his own great stupidity. When I had finished telling them, there was a long and heavy silence broken only by the distant roaring of lions, the yapping of night-hunting jackals and the cough of leopards in the midnight forest.

Then the leader said: "This girl Mulinda, is she here, Oh Undying One?"

"Yes she is here."

"She must be brought out."

Mulinda came out of her hut after Luanaledi had gone to call her and she knelt down before the hard-faced Avenger leader. I could not see the girl, but I could see her soul and the great fear that tore through her. She was wishing the earth would suddenly open and swallow her; she was aware of the terrible fact that death was staring her in the face and she realised that she was very young to be struck down so suddenly and so cruelly.

"You are Mulinda, daughter of Luojoyo and Nyaloti, and sister of Vamba Nyaloti?" said the High Leader in a voice so utterly cold and pitiless that it would have struck fear into the hearts of the bravest.

"I am Mulinda."

"Fifteen days ago you were used by your brother Vamba to decoy one Zwangezwi, a son of one Malandela, so-called chief of this land, into a certain place in the forest, there to be murdered by your brother—is that not so?"

"It is so," whispered the girl.

"In the forest you broke an old tribal law together with this Zwangezwi, who was a youth as yet not permitted to have anything to do with women. Then you saw this youth being murdered and mangled by your brother and his followers. Is it or is it not so?"

"No . . ." sobbed the girl, "I . . ."

"Is it or is it not so?"

Silence.

"Speak female . . . Is it or is it not so!"

"It is so, but . . ."

"Quiet! I pronounce you guilty of being party to the murder and I also find you guilty of breaking an old tribal law and I sentence you to death here and now."

"Mercy," cried the girl, "I only did what . . ."

Her voice was cut short as the heavy Club of Execution in the hands of the Avenger leader shattered her skull. Mulinda sank lifeless to the ground just as her mother crawled out of her hut to plead with the Avengers for her daughter's life. The mute mother saw the Avengers stand up and take turns to spit upon her child's body and she uttered one strangling sound as she fell down to the ground in a dead faint. I ordered Mamana and Muwaniwani to take her into the Great Hut and revive her.

"We must hurry to the Great Royal Kraal and warn that fool Malandela," cried the Avenger leader. "It is four days' journey away from here and we must start well before daybreak. I only hope we are not too late."

While my daughters and I had been busy in Madondo's kraal preparing messages to send to Malandela and to Vamba, great things were already happening in Malandela's kraal—great and utterly disastrous.

* * * * *

The leader of the Vamangwe Tribe, Vamba, could not sleep as usual, as his soul was one seething cauldron of boiling emotions: anger and bitterness, envy and sorrow growled in one steaming confusion within his tormented soul and Vamba was slowly becoming aware of another feeling creeping into his restless spirit. This was a feeling he had never before known in his life—fear, pure naked fear which tore his heart apart like so many hyænas tearing at a dead buffalo.

Vamba was afraid, and he knew it. He was afraid because the one person who could expose his secret plans to the Nguni was alive somewhere in the land and that person was Mulinda, Vamba's own sister, whom he had entombed alive in the cave, but who had been rescued by unknown females and taken away. This was what worried Vamba so much. Who had those females been? Where had they come from and where were they now?

That Mulinda had told them about his doings by now, Vamba had no doubts. And it would not be long before those females came, or sent someone to tell Malandela, the High King. Vamba knew he had to act, and act fast. Already a terrible plan was forming deep in the valleys of his gifted mind.

Vamba paused in his thinking and listened to the night sounds—the faint and faraway roaring of lions, the derisive hooting of an owl in a nearby tree. Then from the hut nearest to his own came a burst of female laughter, and the bitterness within his heart exploded into searing white-hot hatred. He knew that it was one of his wives laughing, wives whom he could never make love to and for whose pregnancy he depended on another, his hated cousin Mukingo.

Vamba cursed his mother for the hundredth time and vowed once again to cut her throat with his own hands if he met her one day. 'Cur bitch,' he thought. 'When I find you one day I shall kill you so slowly you will wish for death a thousand times before you actually die. I shall make you pay for what you did to me—bringing me into this world in this condition, a useless, unnatural and deformed thing. I shall make you pay!'

Once again the ecstatic ripple of laughter stung Vamba's ears, and the man who was not quite a man could imagine one of his wives in his cousin's arms—in spite of the rules of mourning.

Vamba bit his lips until blood flowed. He snarled and beat the sleeping mat with his fists. He wept and cursed, and cursed again. He ground his teeth until his jaws ached. Then he leapt to his feet and pounded one of the wooden posts that held up the roof of the hut with his fists until his knuckles bled. Even as he did that, Vamba was glad he could not see his naked body in the darkness. The sight of his own body always filled him with fear, loathing and disgust, which was why he always wore a long leopard-skin kilt and sipuku that covered his chest completely.

Vamba was tall and slender in a feminine way with the rounded hips of a woman. He was not handsome, but pretty in a delicate girlish way, and he even had the silvery voice of a female. Under the tight-fitting leopard-skin sipuku he wore over the upper part of his body, he hid two breasts, both covered with scars as he had frequently tried, in fits of hatred and madness, to amputate them.

By strict tribal law Vamba should have been strangled at birth or taken out and thrown to the crocodiles. But what parent can bring herself to murder her own offspring in cold blood? Strong are the Laws of the Tribes, but stronger still the laws of Nature. So Vamba had lived to grow into adulthood—the object of scorn and derision of all who saw him. And within the growing Vamba had grown a terrible flower—a cold, calculating hatred of the human race.

"I am going to do something so great that future generations will remember me—will tremble when they hear about it from the lips of story-tellers," he gritted in the darkness of the hut. "I am going to set the world of the Nguni and the Western Mambo on fire! I shall kindle the flames of such a war that men will die in their thousands every day. Come tomorrow, come dawn, and I shall laugh as I see the piles of dead bodies rotting in the sun. I shall rejoice when blood flows like rivers through the land. I shall dance in the clearings of burning kraals and I shall sing while the screams of the dying crash against the sky. Come tomorrow, come! Yes, even you, fat stupid lecher Malandela and your fat albino slut Muxakaza—even you, the so-called king and queen of the Nguni dog-tribe—I shall play upon your bitterness and grief as if it were a marimba xylophone. I shall use you as torches to kindle the greatest war the land has ever seen. You will be my tools, you puppets, for the destruction of your own and Bekizwe's tribes.”

A sudden burst of strange feeling erupted like a falling star over Vamba's soul. He suddenly felt as if he were a god, and the whole world but a louse in the palm of his hand—a louse he could crush to pulp, if and when he chose, with ridiculous ease. He suddenly felt as if he were a mighty player of murabaraba games and the whole human race was but the stones he used, stones he would shift hither and thither at his whim. Vamba felt strong, uplifted and inspired beyond his wildest dreams and his bloody plan was sharply etched in his mind. Yea-ha, Vamba had become an image, a puppet of pure evil and he was ready to plunge the lands of the Nguni, and the Mambo of the west, headlong into the greatest war the land has ever witnessed.

He rose well before dawn and washed his face in a big clay bowl standing outside his hut. The song of the early rising birds was loud in his ears as he donned his rich High Witchdoctor's attire—his headdress with curving horns on either side and dark sakabuli tail feathers fluttering on top; his newest sipuku heavily decorated with copper scales and cowrie shells; his broad girdle of heavy bronze beads, and his knee-length kilt of black sable skin heavily patterned with cowries and other rare and holy shells.

On his arms and forearms blazed broad copper bracelets and around both his ankles he tied the traditional witchdoctor's mfece seed rattles. Then he threw his great leopard-skin kaross over one shoulder, seized his great heavy lion spear in his right hand and crawled out of his hut. Treading lightly, and with a hard expression on his face, Vamba made his way to Malandela's kraal in the early dew-moist and mist-shrouded dawn.

* * * * *

The Lion of the Nguni, Malandela the Mighty and the Fearless One, had not slept for three whole nights and had not eaten for many more days. His soul was racked by grief and aflame with murderous anger, directed against nobody in particular—but an anger that needed but a little fuel to burst into flames that would consume thousands of men.

He was sitting in his great hut with his face to the wall in a pose of mourning. Beside him sat his three High Wives, Muxakaza (rattle of battle spears), who was the First Wife or Ndlovukazi (She-Elephant) according to Nguni nomenclature. Muxakaza was the strangest queen that any tribe has ever had and she was the topic of many a whispered conversation even in the remotest corners of her husband's vast kingdom. Muxakaza was the most beautiful woman in the land of the Nguni, which was well known for the beauty of its women. But she was a 'cursed one'—an albino. Malandela had been struck by the great beauty of this creature; he had married her and made her his First Queen, instead of having her thrown over the cliff as was always done to albinos. Muxakaza had presented Malandela with two sons, the boys to whom Vamba had secretly given the leaking canoe and who were drowned as a result.

The Second Wife was Zuzeni (what have I gained), an ill-favoured, but hot-blooded female who was the mother of the dead Zwangezwi and who was half-mad with grief at the loss of her only son.

The Third Wife Celiwe (the one we asked for) was a tiny little thing who, at thirty summers, still looked like a girl of sixteen, and whose great big eyes, set in a beautiful round yellow-brown face, had earned her the nickname of Sikhovana (little owl). Celiwe was as kind hearted as she was beautiful and she was famous for her charity to the needy and her keen foresight. And she was bitterly hated by both Muxakaza and Zuzeni who were proud and evil women, well known for their cruelty and great wickedness, a wickedness that manifested itself in many ways. For example, Zuzeni had developed an unnatural and secret habit of wooing and actually loving other females, preferably young girls, as man loves woman, and one of her handmaidens was her sweetheart whom she forbade to so much as look at men, under pain of death. Muxakaza, on the other hand, loved bloodshed; she loved seeing men killed and she was always present at mass executions. She used to whip the many members of Malandela's seraglio and was never satisfied until the luckless concubine was unconscious and bleeding at her feet.

Malandela was not wearing any ornaments and neither for that matter were his wives, who had washed the red clay off their cylindrical coiffures, as was the custom when people's hearts were 'black' (mourning). At such times they were not supposed to wear any ornaments at all and were always supposed to sit and face the walls of the hut and to speak only when strictly necessary.

Malandela was a big fat round-shouldered man with a high forehead, large flat nose and a mouth that was always set in a hard determined line. His eyes seemed able to penetrate a person's soul. He was a brave man, but he had neither wisdom nor foresight and mercy was an unknown thing to him. He was stubborn and quick tempered and he had a habit of killing first and asking questions afterwards.

A young concubine crawled into the Great Hut where Malandela and his High Wives were sitting in a mourning attitude, and she struck her chest twice with her fist, then crossed her hands in front of her face in silent salutation.

"What is it?"

"Vamba Nyaloti, the High Witchdoctor is here, Oh High Ones."

"Tell him to come in."

Vamba Nyaloti crawled into the Great Hut and, like the concubine, he crossed his hands in front of his face and then kissed the floor of the Great Hut. He waited with well-feigned humility for Malandela to break the heavy silence.

"My son," growled the High King, "you are the only one I trust and yours is the only voice I have ears for. Before my eyes you are the only light I depend upon to light the darkness that is my life. Tell me, Vamba, who is the secret wizard who is causing the deaths of my sons? Three years ago I lost two sons in one day under mysterious circumstances. I have never found out just what my sons had been doing in the river and nobody ever told me where they had got the canoe from which they were drowned. Now my last hope, Zwangezwi, is gone and I am left with a hundred daughters—girls, mere useless girls who cannot carry even the lightest shield in battle. Zwangezwi also died under mysterious circumstances—I do not know what in the name of my first ancestor led him into the forest so far away from home. What was he doing in that cave in any case? What led him there? Who was the other dead man with him in the cave? As you know, the searchers found nothing but scattered bones picked clean by hyænas, and only some ornaments could identify him. Tell me, Vamba, ask the Spirits . . . throw your bones. Stand on your head and lie on your back . . . but tell me who killed my sons."

"Tell us, Vamba," said the First Queen. "Tell us who the secret enemy is who wants to break my husband's knees. Tell us who it is that wants the Lion of the Nguni to depart to his ancestors in the Spirit World, without leaving an heir. Tell us who it is that is fighting a secret magic war against Malandela."

Vamba stood up and slowly he raised his hands to the heavens; his entire body shook like a leaf in a tempest. His long-lashed eyes glazed over and froth burst from the corners of his mouth. Sweat streamed down his face and a flood of 'spirit talk' burst out of his open mouth. Then slowly with his hands still raised, Vamba sank to his knees, very slowly. Still acting, he fell flat on his face, as if struck from behind by an unseen hand, and lay still for a long time. Malandela and his women felt their hair struggle to stand on end while their crawling skins suddenly erupted into pimples of fear. They stared in fascination at the prostrate form of Vamba—like buck hypnotised by a python. Then slowly Vamba 'came to life' and like a man in a trance, or a sleepwalker, he reached a slow hand to his girdle and untied the pouch which contained his amadolo and mazinyo-endlovu.*

Vamba took the pouch in both hands and emptied its contents slowly on the ground while Malandela and his women watched like people under a great spell—which they were in a sense. Malandela watched the slow stream of falling bones, ivory pieces and shells until he felt drowsy. Then in a flash of sudden movement, Vamba scooped up the pile of bones in both hands—spat on it once, twice, then shook it violently, making one continuous rattling sound. He then opened his cupped hands suddenly, spreading the 'bones' on the floor.

With an agonizing scream Vamba leapt away from the bones as if they were so many snakes. He crouched in the very centre of the Great Hut with a look of fear on his face—a look intended for Malandela to notice and to worry about.

"What is it Vamba?" he demanded. "What do the bones say?"

"I cannot bring myself to tell you, Oh High One," muttered Vamba.

"Why, why?" cried Queen Muxakaza. "Why can't you tell us?"

"I am afraid, Oh Great She-Elephant," whispered Vamba. "I am utterly afraid!"

"Vamba," said Malandela in a terrible voice, "tell me what the bones say."

"Cha!" cried Vamba. "No, never!"

"Listen, Oh son of Nyaloti," hissed Muxakaza, "tell us what you see or by the spirits, you shall not leave this hut alive!"

Vamba's girlish mouth hardened into a line of cold defiance: "I would rather die ten times than tell you."

"Why?" the gentle Celiwe asked, raising her eyebrows and opening her great soft eyes very wide. "Why, Oh Vamba, what do the bones say?"

*Bones from the heels of goats, and other carved pieces of ivory and a few cowrie shells. This strange collection of bones, ivory and shells, generally referred to as 'bones', is used in divination.

"I cannot bring myself to tell you, Oh High Ones, let other lips than mine tell you the message of the bones and shells." ...

"Celiwe," said Malandela, "go and call the Wise Ones Luva and Mukingo, and also my sister Nomikonto, and be quick about it."

"As you say, lord."

Some time later Celiwe came back and crawled into the small entrance of the Great Hut, closely followed by the old Vamangwe witchdoctor-storyteller Luva, and Vamba's cousin Mukingo, who were shortly followed by Malandela's mountainous sister, Nomikonto, who got stuck as usual half-in and half-out of the hut in the small entrance. To be brought inside the hut, Celiwe pulled from within and one of the High King's concubines pushed from without.

Although Nomikonto was now thirty years old, she was unmarried and still a virgin, because there was nothing on earth she feared more than marriage. The very word 'husband' was sufficient to send her squealing with terror.

Briefly Malandela explained the situation to Luva and Mukingo and ended by demanding that they should tell him what the bones said. Luva took one glance at the bones, which formed a clear pattern that read 'killer is within the kraal', and he all but seared Vamba with a look of well-feigned contempt and said: "This timid one is afraid to tell the truth for fear of starting a war. The message of the bones reads that the one who is causing the deaths of the Lion's sons is the Lion's own brother. A witchdoctor must have the courage to tell the truth, no matter how unpleasant, Oh Vamba!"

A terrible silence followed—a silence so deep, one could have heard the sound of a falling feather. The silence was so terrible that one's own heartbeat sounded like a hundred war-drums. Then Malandela broke the silence at long last, his voice sounding like that of a man speaking from the depths of a great cave—hollow and horribly unreal: "Throw those bones again, Oh Vamba."

Once again Vamba scooped up the bones, spat on them, shook them thoroughly and then scattered them once more. Another deep silence followed, a silence Muxakaza broke harshly: "Tell us what the bones say, quickly!"

Luva swept the scattered bones with his rheumy eyes and he read silently to himself the message displayed: 'The evil ones shall soon be scattered and their evil schemes exposed.' But to Malandela he said: "The message is still more or less like the first one, Oh Lion of the Nguni. The bones point to one who is a male, who was carried in the same womb that carried you, who is secretly killing your heirs—and who will soon send a tokoloshe to strangle you in your sleep."

"That is a lie!" screamed Nomikonto (daughter of battle spears). "Brother Bekizwe would never do such a thing. You lie, you foreign charlatans. My brothers love each other; do not try to set them at each other's throats!"

"Be silent you fat, vile spinster," cried Muxakaza. "Who are you to insult those whom the spirits protect? On what grounds are you calling Vamba a liar? Tell me, you greasy strumpet, is it not obvious, does it not strike you as strange that of the two kings in this land only our lord Malandela loses sons, while Bekizwe loses none? Why must we be empty-handed while the wives of Bekizwe carry sons in their arms? Can't you see that something strange is going on? I always suspected that Bekizwe was a wizard and now I am sure. He is the one who had cast a spell on Zwangezwi, causing him to wander off into the forest where he was murdered, probably by followers of Bekizwe. I am sure of it. And it will take more than a bloated spinster . . .”

The albino queen's voice broke short as Nomikonto's great fist crashed home full on her pink jaw. “Spinster yourself, you foul cursed baboon female!” she hissed as the Great Queen slumped unconscious to the ground. “Whoever it is who has been killing Malandela's sons may not be known to me, but I am positive it is not brother Bekizwe. If it is anybody it could be you, you Vamangwe renegades. Do you hear me, Vamba? It could be you!”

“You are mad, Nomikonto!” cried Malandela. “The Vamangwe people are the most loyal and the most trustworthy in all the land. Why would they kill the sons of their benefactor? I think you need a man's embrace to put your mad brain right. Come on, Mukingo, take her.”

But before Mukingo could move, Nomikonto was out of the hut like a big fat mouse—with no difficulty getting through the door—and had run to her own hut where she shut herself up securely. Then Malandela turned to Vamba once again and bade him to throw the bones a third time. This time Vamba read the scattered bones himself and while he clearly read ‘the hawk of retribution will be swift to overtake the wicked fowls’, he read out aloud: “Unless the Lion takes quick action now, the Hyæna of the West shall strip him of his mane.”

In the heavy silence that followed, Malandela was heard to say: “That is all I need to know. So my brother Bekizwe wants to kill me, does he? Well, I shall kill him—first!”

Before anyone else could move, Malandela was out of his hut and bellowing for his two personal servant boys, Bafana and Madoda-Doda. “Go and tell all the Rainbow Indunas and all the Battle Indunas that I want every attack regiment and every reserve regiment in full battle order assembled before the Great Kraal at midday. Hurry up, shesha!” roared Malandela to Madoda-Doda. To the fleet-footed Bafana he bellowed: “You, go to the spear-makers and tell them I want them to bring five hundred thousand assegais, five hundred thousand battle-axes, and eighty thousand mpangas. Go . . . run!”

The two boys ran like the wind to carry out the High King's commands and Malandela crawled back into his hut and thundered to everybody. “I am now declaring war on my brother whom I mean to defeat and kill like the treacherous dog he is! I shall make him pay for the sorrow he has caused me. You, witchdoctors, go and prepare for the Ceremony of the Strengthening of the Warriors!”

Vamba, Luva and Mukingo went out of the Great Hut to the hut allocated to them within the Great Kraal, to prepare for the coming ceremony, the most interesting ceremony of any witchdoctor's career. Thoughts flashed fast through Vamba's mind: ‘You have accomplished it at long last, Oh Vamba. Malandela has fallen into your hands like a fat pumpkin. He is doing exactly what you wanted him to do and there is going to be an ugly war—soon!’

“Fools are born to be the tools of the wise,” quoted Luva. “And the old proverb says that the gains of quarrelling fools become food for the monkeys—does it not say so, Vamba?”

“Be quiet you two and don't clap hands until the dance has started,” said Vamba.

“The struggle is as good as won,” said Luva. “The fat dog Malandela may not know it yet, but he is a king no more!”

"Now listen you two," said Vamba tersely. "As soon as Malandela leaves with his armies I want you to bring every able-bodied Vamangwe of fighting age here. I want you to seize this kraal and proclaim Mukingo the new king of the Nguni, which shall thereafter be known as the Vamangwe.

"Me!" exclaimed Mukingo in great surprise. "Proclaim me a Chief?"

"That is what you have been wanting all the time, is it not, Oh Mukingo?" asked Vamba sarcastically. "You always love to eat the fruits of the labours of others and I am now handing over the fruits of my labours to you."

"But what about you?" asked Mukingo.

"As soon as you are proclaimed High King of the Nguni—the Vamangwe, rather—I shall take a long journey in search of a certain woman I have sworn to kill. After that I shall kill myself."

"You do not mean your mother, do you?" asked Luva. "But you cannot . . ."

"Yes, I do mean my dear, beautiful—and detestable—mother!"

"Listen, foul dog," growled Mukingo, "you will do nothing of the kind. We still need your scheming brain around here and you will stay and help me rule if I have to tie you hand and foot."

* * * * *

As the sun climbed to the very peak of the silver heavens, the first two attack regiments came chanting up the cattle pathway that led up to the Great Kraal. In front was the First Attack Regiment, or Night Owls, each warrior wearing a headband of lion skin into which two tall feathers of an owl were fastened. The Night Owl Regiment carried black shields with white magabela decorations and wore black bands of sable antelope skin on their forearms and legs. Behind the Night Owls came the Second Attack Regiment, the Flamingoes, Malandela's own regiment, whose warriors carried white shields and wore cowrie-shell studded headbands with flamingo feathers. They also wore great tufts of white cow tails around their legs, wrists and upper arms.

After these two units came the dreaded Beggars Regiment whose members wore headdresses of sisal fibre and violet-dyed fibre skirts around their waists. They carried zebra skin shields and a special knobkierie shaped like a fish. Every single warrior in this regiment was a veteran of more than ten successful campaigns.

But more fantastic was the regiment that followed—a regiment with the apt name of The Madmen, whose warriors carried no shields and were swathed from head to foot in tattered old impala, jackal and hyæna skins.

This regiment used only clubs studded with crude metal nails, and double-headed battle axes. They were men trained for savage hand-to-hand combat and never used spears. Each and every warrior was a raging, bloodthirsty maniac in battle and whenever the madmen were sent into a fight, the enemy very promptly took to their heels. Nothing on earth could stand against them and their fame had spread as far north as the land of the Baluba.

After the Madmen came lesser regiments, the most remarkable of which was the Magundane (the Mice), a regiment of boys aged seventeen to twenty.

By full midday, close to eighty regiments—each consisting of 2,000 men—were marched around the Great Kraal of Malandela, like swarms of bees around a hive.

Spearmakers went from regiment to regiment distributing weapons of all kinds from piled sleds drawn by boys and even oxen.

Sled-loads of corn cakes and meat were also distributed among the warriors, as were great potsful of corn beer. The warriors ate heartily and drank deeply, and waited.

Then Malandela appeared in full battle regalia at the gate of his kraal and the age-old salutation, Bayede, burst from nearly two hundred thousand throats.

MALANDELA, whose name means 'He that follows', stood at the gate of his sprawling circular kraal and looked with angry pride at his massed impis darkening the land as far as the eye could see. On either side of him stood his six famous Rainbow Indunas. There was the hunchbacked, wry-mouthed mute giant Ngovolo, a veteran of countless battles who commanded the regiment, The Beggars. His exact opposite, the massive bow-legged dwarf with the big head and only one eye, Malangabi, who had killed a whole pride of lions single handed, commanded the regiment, The Madmen. Then there was the great thinker, Mapepela, as wise as he was brave, and tremendously fat, the only man who could out-eat and out-drink and talk back to Malandela himself—and the only man who referred to Malandela to his face as 'Old Thundering Stomach'. Mapepela was Malandela's Chief Adviser and Malandela had two of Mapepela's sisters in his seraglio, one of whom was the famous Celiwe—the beautiful and the wise.

Then there were Ziko and Majozi, who were brothers and who jointly commanded the regiment, The Night Owls. They were a youthful pair of hard-drinking, hard-loving and hard-fighting hotheads, also famed as great singers and story-tellers who had composed long verses in praise of Malandela.

Finally came the fierce, loud-voiced old man Solozi, who had fought under Malandela's ill-fated father, Mitiyonka, who was murdered by his own wife and daughters. Solozi, whose name means a kind of pumpkin, was the best—or rather the worst—braggart in Malandela's kraal. Although he had never been in love with any woman and had never married, because of his natural shyness, he boasted about the hundreds of mistresses he had taken to the love-mat—mistresses who existed only in his fertile and colourful imagination. He was among the bravest of men, but his life was one big falsehood, one big lie.

These were some of Malandela's famous Rainbow Indunas—men who were one day destined to accompany their king on the greatest journey of all time, the Journey to Asazi, the journey to 'we know not where'.

* * * * *

Members of the Boys' Regiment, the Mice, led fifteen oxen into the centre of Malandela's Great Kraal—oxen that were to be used in the coming Ceremony of Strengthening the Warriors. From every regiment the Battle Indunas selected twenty men who ran into the second gate and surrounded the fifteen oxen in the centre of the great clearing among the many hundreds of grass huts that made up Mzinwengwe—Malandela's Royal Kraal. (Mzinwengwe means 'the kraal of the leopard' and Malandela was fondly called the Leopard or the Lion of the Nguni.)

The duty of the men, who had been chosen from every regiment, was to slaughter the fifteen oxen without weapons—by kicking, pummeling and tearing them apart. The flesh of these oxen was cut into little pieces and pickled with juice from crushed, bitter-tasting herbs before being given to the warriors to eat raw. Being made to eat meat so treated upset a man's stomach and left a very bad and bitter taste in his mouth, and this was destined to kindle a man's temper in battle—which it always did with disastrous results to the enemy.

Then from their hut came Luva, Vamba and Mukingo, together with the tall, hard-faced Dambisa-Luwewe, the female Vamangwe sybil. Vamba, Mukingo and Luva were covered from head to foot in billowing fibre costumes and looked like faceless long-haired beasts that had just emerged from the swamps of Demon land. But the female Dambisa-Luwewe wore nothing except a long fringed mask with a toothy, hideous grin—grotesque in every respect and representing the female demon Watamaraka. Dambisa-Luwewe's naked body was furthermore painted with broad stripes of red, white and grey clay and she carried two great skin bags of thousands of dirty green pellets of the dreaded lubanji drug which turns men into raging bloodthirsty beasts who no longer feel pain, and who can still fight with enemy spears buried deep in their bodies. So fantastic is the power of this ancient drug that men under its influence have been known to fight on with arms cut off, and other severe wounds from which blood was freely flowing.

Dancing, leaping and shrieking like demons, Vamba and his followers tore through the circle of men surrounding the fifteen oxen and danced from beast to beast, spitting at each and calling it all sorts of vile names. The lithe Dambisa-Luwewe brought lusty cheers from the throats of the assembled warriors by leaping high into the air and doing a double somersault on the backs of two oxen and landing on her feet on the other side. This was the signal for the war drums to sound forth a thundering tempest that filled all hearts with dread. The warriors within and without the kraal began to dance, each regiment in perfect formation, led by its battle leaders and Rainbow Indunas. The angry red dust rose in columns from tens of thousands of stamping feet.

"Heshe! Heshe!" went the rhythmic chant from thousands of throats. Then from the mouths of the watching women who peered over the grass fences and guma screens in front of the entrances of their huts burst the blood-curdling Kikiza cry: "Li-li-li-li-kee-kee-keeee-!" At that signal Dambisa-Luwewe did another breath-taking somersault over two oxen and then danced away together with Vamba and the other two men.

With bloodthirsty yells of pure savagery the chosen warriors closed in on the oxen with punching fists and clawing fingers to tear them apart. All but one ox went down under a pile of yelling and bellowing men who gouged out their eyes, tore their ears off and broke their horns from their skulls. But this beast fought back equally savagely, tossing men high into the air and trampling others underfoot. It broke away—an evil omen—and charged down the great clearing to the First Gate where Malandela and his six Indunas were standing.

The mute hunchbacked giant Ngovolo leapt forward and seized the beast by the horns while the dwarf Malangabi went behind and seized its tail. A short fierce struggle followed in which Ngovolo broke the animal's neck and then helped Malangabi to drag it back to the centre of the clearing. The dead warriors whom the ox had gored and trampled down were carried away for quick burial by members of the Mice, while the other warriors drew their mpangas and cut up the dead oxen into little pieces, each about the size of two or three fingers. This done, the witchdoctors emptied great potsful of juice from crushed ntshuba leaves on the pile of meat, rendering it terribly bitter.

At a signal from Malandela the clearing was emptied and everybody proceeded to march in at the first gate and out of the second. As each warrior passed the pile of raw and evil-tasting meat he picked up a piece and immediately started chewing it. A strict watch was kept by the battle leaders to ensure that nobody spat out the foul meat. Those who tried to bolt it down to reduce the clinging foul taste left behind in their mouths, choked themselves and had to be thumped on the back by their fellows. As the warriors came out of the second gate chewing and with ugly scowls on their sweating faces, the masked Dambisa-Luwewe thrust the green lubanji pellets into their mouths and each man was forced to swallow the pellets with the meat.

In the late afternoon about two hundred thousand angry warriors, with aching stomachs and a nasty taste in the mouth, filed at a brisk pace past where Malandela stood with his Rainbow Indunas. As each sullen evil-tempered warrior went past his king, he stooped low and saluted by placing his right hand above his heart. Many were the foul whispered curses the warriors directed at Malandela, who was not what one might call a popular leader.

With a loud shout, Majozi and Ziko leapt away from the group around Malandela and stood facing him. Majozi started to praise his king, leaping high into the air, stamping his feet, falling flat on his stomach and even standing on his hands with his feet in the air.

You are the black eagle of sunset
That snatches the lamp from the hands of Galaza;
You snatched the lamp and brought it
To your nest to warm your eaglets with.
You are the Lion of Sunrise
That stalked the craven impala
And brought it into your great den
To feed us, your cubs, till we grow.
River of Wisdom that flowed from Between the breasts of Nomvula;
Flame of Courage that was lit
By the valiant Mitiyonke—

Bayede, Bayede Uyi Zulu. (Hail, Hail, you are the heavens.)

So chanted the greatest tribal poet that ever lived. As he finished the last verse, he leapt up and allowed himself to fall violently to the ground, lying still in pretended death. His brother Ziko stood over him like a warrior victorious in battle and sang a song, a song destined to be famous for scores of generations to come. Ziko held his spears in one raised hand and his shield in the other.

He stood thus, still as a carved image, while tears flowed down his face and his lips trembled as he sang—the ‘Song of the Warriors’:

My ears have heard the battle drum—
Summoning me to war;
My soul has heard the voice of God—
Calling on me to die.
I’ve snatched up war’s whetted tools
And now I stand prepared;
My headdress nods upon my head—
My ox-hide shield is here,
And bright in the midsummer sun
Glitter my honed spears.
Before I lay me down and die;
Before my heart is stilled—
I’ll send into Kalunga’s Hell,
A hundred foes and more—
That men in years as yet to come
Shall speak my name with awe.
The hoary past looks down on me—
The silent future waits;
And loud my dead ancestors call—
Go conquer son, or die!
Farewell, farewell, my mother dear,
Farewell my wrinkled sire;
And you that share my marriage mat
Weep not for me, farewell!
I ask not, God, to come back safe,
But that victory be mine!

With a roar that shook the very heavens, some two hundred thousand voices took up the savage refrain of the last two lines—and went on chanting the last line again and again.

For Malandela and his Indunas there remained yet one ceremony, one which tested a man’s courage to the utmost and one which was effective in its simplicity—the throwing of the Royal Spear. Malandela summoned all his Rainbow Indunas, his lesser Battle Indunas and battle leaders to the centre of the great clearing in his kraal. They came and stood in a circle around their king who had laid aside all his weapons except one heavy throwing spear. This he was going to throw high into the air, and as straight up as possible above his men’s heads. The idea was to see which man lost his nerve, jerked his head up to see where the spear would fall. The spear would turn around and come down point first among them. But nobody must make the slightest movement.

Malandela bent backwards with the spear poised in his hand; he straightened suddenly and the spear hissed into the air. Not one man among his Indunas moved a hair in those few terrible moments while hearts stopped functioning. Then there was a dull thud and all eyes turned to see where the spear had landed. It had missed Mapepela’s protruding stomach by a thumb’s length and still stood quivering in the ground a finger's length from his big flat feet. A barely audible sigh went out from the lips of each man—the test was over.

"All regiments," roared Malandela, "all regiments follow the setting sun Westward! Westward!"

The Flamingoes went first, closely followed by the Beggars, Madmen and Night Owls. Regiment followed regiment in perfect battle order and last of all the Boys' Regiment, the Mice, who carried hundreds of sleeping mats, tens of thousands of corn cakes and huge slabs of boiled meat for the other regiments. Some of the boys even carried big bags full of nsangu (dagga or mariuana) and great magudu water pipes used by the warriors in smoking this drug.

The Mice were never used in actual battle—or very seldom. They were simply camp followers and scouts. All tribal armies had one or two Boys' Regiments, some as many as four.

* * * * *

The Third Wife Celiwe was standing behind the guma screen that shielded the entrance to her hut and watching the regiments depart towards the West. She heard their chanting grow fainter and fainter the farther they went and, like a secret spear thrown by a coward from a hiding place, fear tore through the little woman's heart—a meaningless fear, fear without a reason and all the more terrible for that. Something was very wrong somewhere, but Celiwe could not for the life of her tell what it was. Although it was a very hot day, Celiwe suddenly felt a chill wind caressing her back and the pimples of fear erupted all over her crawling skin. A small voice suddenly started to whisper in her mind: 'Get out of this kraal—get out!'

Beads of sweat jewelled Celiwe's round little forehead and her huge eyes opened wide. Her heart seemed to miss a few beats. "There is evil afoot, I can feel it," she sobbed. "But what am I do to?"

* * * * *

The Lord of Day sank beyond the western mountains and his last rays stained the weeping clouds a fiery, passionate red. Darkness, the usurper, slowly claimed the world thus abandoned by the sun, until the trees were sharp silhouettes against the burning sky. There was a roar of thousands of hooves as countless cattle were driven into the pens from the pastures by more than a hundred Royal Herdboys. Loud in Celiwe's ears were the bawling of cows and the whistles and shouts of the herdboys. Sharp in her little nostrils came the smell of fresh dung and persistent in her heart there was the strange still voice: 'Get out of this kraal!'

The silent moon rose in the eastern sky—the holy missile with which the Tree of Life stunned the Great Mother millions of years ago. Slowly the caitiff Darkness yielded before the Orb of Peace, which flung a veil of shimmering light over the head of her sleeping baby, protecting it from the stings of ravening mosquitos.

Aieeeee! But even as the Orb of Peace shed its light on the enchanted earth, the footsteps of evil came with stealthy and silent pace to within striking distance of the Great Kraal.

Foul were the grins of savage triumph worn by the thousands of Vamangwe cut-throats as they crept nearer and nearer to the lightly defended kraal. They went down on their bellies in secret ambush in the forest that surrounded Mzinwengwe, waiting for the treacherous Vamba to set one of the huts near the gate on fire as a signal for attack.

All this Celiwe did not know. But as the silver-drenched night wore on, so within her grew the great uneasiness. Then she saw something strange happening near the first gate which had just been closed for the night by members of the Old Men's Regiment, the Tortoises.

She saw Vamba and Mukingo come walking slowly towards the two old warriors guarding the gate and engage them in conversation. Celiwe could not hear because of the great distance. Then she saw Luva creep behind one of the old men and stab him in the back, while both Mukingo and Vamba seized the second guard and dragged him into the shadows. A spear flashed as it stabbed downwards in the moonlight . . . once . . . twice.

Celiwe turned and ran to the hut of Nomikonto, the High Chief's sister. She found the princess reclining on a pile of leopard skins inside her hut with her two handmaidens washing her feet with warm water in a great stone bowl.

"Great One," gasped Celiwe, "there is treachery! I have just seen Vamba and Luva and Mukingo murder the two guards at the first gate . . ."

"What!" Nomikonto leapt to her feet, upsetting the stone basin and sending one of the handmaidens sprawling. "I thought some such thing might happen. I knew it! Oh, my stupid, gullible, headstrong, foolish brother Malandela—I never did trust those Vamangwe dog-people!"

"We must warn all the women, Great Princess," said Celiwe. "They must escape while there is still time."

"Come on, you girls," said Nomikonto to her handmaidens, "Go and warn all the other women and tell them to leave the kraal quietly by the second and third gates. Hurry up . . . come on, hurry!"

"Tell them, added Celiwe, "tell them to make their way into the forest and assemble near the Rock of the Eagles. Send boys to warn the Indunas of the Tortoises as well. Hurry, my children, hurry!"

The girls ran like scalded mice out of the hut and just then an inspiration came to Celiwe. She ran out of the hut with Nomikonto close behind her and crawled into the Great Hut where the first and second queens were already sleeping. Without bothering to wake them, Celiwe seized one of Malandela's battle bugles and crawled out again, leaving Nomikonto to awaken the sleeping queens. Once outside, Celiwe put the bugle to her lips and blew one long blast and three short ones, the signal for Vukanibo—"Everybody wake up".

The ever-ready members of the Home Regiment, the Tortoises, who slept with their headdresses and loin-aprons on, tumbled out of their huts with shields and spears in their hands, ready to die for their High Chief's Kraal, cattle and wives. But from the gate came Vamba's cold and contemptuous voice: "Hear me, you old and doddering idiots . . . I have the kraal completely surrounded. You are outnumbered two to one and if you so much as raise a finger, I shall order the massacre of every living thing in this kraal, men, women and children alike. Lay down your spears and I shall let you get out of this kraal alive to spend the remainder of your wretched lives in peace."

"What guarantee have we of that, Oh treacherous one?" asked Jezeza, the old Induna commanding the Tortoises. "And what about the High Chief's wives?"

"I gave you my word, Oh miserable old goat," sneered Vamba, "and I shall see to it that the blood of your High Chief's wives will not be spilt, provided you do not try to resist. So lay down your spears now."

"Our duty is to defend the Kraal of our Chief to the last drop of our blood, Oh Vamba, and this shall be done," Jezeza said quietly.

But Nomikonto, who had come out of the great hut with Muxakaza and Zuzeni, raised her husky voice and called out to Jezeza and his men who were forming up to oppose the Vamangwe now advancing on the Kraal openly from all directions: "Loyal servant of my brother, order your men to lay down their arms. It is childish to let blood be spilt in vain. I command you to put down your spears in the name of Malandela."

"But, Oh Great Royal Child," protested the grizzled old Jezeza, "what guarantee have we that the murdering dog of a Vamangwe will keep his word? From Vamba Nyaloti I can accept nothing short of a High Oath!"

"Vamba Nyaloti," said Nomikonto coldly, "I, the daughter of Mitiyonke, the son of Malembe, the son of Vezi, do hereby challenge you to take the High Oath that you will honour your promise that if the Tortoises lay down their spears without the spears having drunk the filth that the Vamangwe have instead of blood, you shall let the old warriors go unharmed and shall also spare my brother's wives and concubines. I, Nomikonto, the undefiled daughter of a thousand kings, challenge you to take the High Oath."

"I accept your contemptible challenge, Oh spinsterly daughter of a thousand Nguni fowl-thieves," laughed Vamba. "I swear by the Great Spirit and by the silver thighs of the Goddess of Creation, the mother of men, and also by the breasts of Mamerave, the second mother of Mankind. I also swear by the loins of the High Father Odu, that if the Tortoises yield and lay down their arms, I shall not spill so much as a drop of the blood of the human beings within this kraal. I, Vamba, the son of Nyaloti, the son of Dawudi, the son of Kabanga—have spoken."

Then Vamba fell on his knees and licked the dust with his tongue, and as he finished taking the High Oath of Solemn Promise, the Vamangwe cut-throat army poured into the Great Kraal.

TRUST NOT A JACKAL'S WORD

AS the Vamangwe poured into the Great Kraal from all directions and through all the ten gates, the outnumbered Tortoises laid down their spears and shields and began ceremoniously burning their grey headdresses in the middle of the clearing—a sign of total though honourable surrender. Then, to the shock of everyone in the Kraal, Vamba raised his stolen spear and cried to the swarming Vamangwe: “To me . . . the Vamangwe . . . to me! Kill these miserable old Nguni fools. Kill them all!”

The Vamangwe, most of whom were drunk and full of mbanje fumes in their bellies and heads, needed no second order; they fell upon the unarmed Tortoises and killed them with great cruelty.

Screaming men were shorn of their members of manhood by bloodthirsty and sadistic Vamangwe, using blunt knives and barbed fishing spears. Vamba and Mukingo stood side by side watching the fearful carnage with cold and contemptuous smiles on their cruel faces, nodding encouragement to those of their followers who tried to outdo one another in acts of cruelty. Shrill screams and loud death cries mingled with the wailing of children and the shrieks of frightened and horrified women.

Auuuu! The silver night so peaceful and lovely hitherto, was defiled by cries of fear and mortal agony and by the sight and smell of human blood. The brave warriors of the Tortoise Regiment were tortured and killed to the last man. But while the Vamangwe had been busy murdering the unarmed old warriors, ten of Malandela's servant boys, led by the two chief servant boys Bafana and Madoda-Doda, seized food and weapons and made their escape into the dark forest, mounted on ten of Malandela's strongest oxen and driving fifty fat cows before them. These brave boys were not stealing; they intended to take all these cattle to a hiding place far away in the mountains for safe keeping until Malandela's return. They had not the time in which to drive away all their King's cattle, but had done as much as they could in the time they did have.

When the Vamangwe had finished torturing and murdering the luckless old men, they stood over the blood-soaked piles of dead bodies and looked with feverish and hungry expectancy first at their leaders Vamba and Mukingo, and then at the vast crowd of women, virgins and children milling around like so many frightened impala.

With a harsh laugh, Mukingo made a sweeping gesture at the women and children, saying: “They are all yours, Oh my jackals. Do with them what you will, but first seize and bring to me that haughty slut of a Nomikonto. She shall be initiated into womanhood by me, Mukingo, High Chief of both the Vamangwe and the Nguni.”

Rough hands seized the Princess Nomikonto, but she fought back savagely with her nails, feet and teeth. She bit the nose off one man and an ear off another. With her fists she knocked the teeth out of the mouth of ten men before she was seized and bound securely hand and foot.

They carried her away into the Great Hut and Nomikonto saw the little Celiwe break away from the clutches of Vamangwe scoundrel who had siezed her, and vanish behind one of the women's huts. She also had a brief glimpse of the First Queen Muxakaza struggling violently on the ground with a burly brute of a Vamangwe who was doing his best to crush the resistance of the fierce and beautiful albino woman under a shower of savage blows with his fists. Everywhere girls and women were locked in fierce struggles with snarling Vamangwe ravishers while children, dead and alive alike, were trampled like lost motherless lambs underfoot.

Nomikonto wept as she was roughly dragged by the hair through the low entrance of the Great Hut. She wept for herself and for the rest of the women throughout the world who were suffering similar indignities at the hands of cruel men—men who never thought once of the harm they do to the souls of their victims by forcibly breaking their 'pure womanhood'.

* * * * *

Nomikonto slowly opened her pain-misted eyes and saw Mukingo standing like an ugly shadow over her. He was obviously very pleased about what he had done and his cruel grin was a blotch of white ivory teeth against his ebony black ugly face, which glistened with sweat that ran in streams down to his chin. Nomikonto felt the stinging pain where Mukingo's sharp teeth had sunk into her smooth cheek at the height of his beastly passion. She also felt the pain where his nails had dug deep into the flesh of the small of her back.

"I have never had a woman like you, Nomikonto," said Mukingo breathlessly. "You must become my wife, my First Queen."

"Never . . . never . . . will that happen . . . I would rather die!"

"A lot depends on how you die, beautiful one," said Mukingo quietly. "A lot depends on how and how soon you die . . ."

"Death is death, regardless of the kaross he is wearing," quoted Nomikonto with equal calm. "And if you do not kill me, I shall kill you, Mukingo!"

"I know you would, so I shall have to kill you first, you and the rest of Malandela's wives."

"Thank you, you could not do us a greater favour. Kill us and get done with it."

"Yes," smiled Mukingo, "I shall kill you, but it will not be a quick death."

With a smile on his ugly face, the fat Mukingo dragged Nomikonto out of the Great Hut by one leg and flung her beside the unconscious forms of Muxakaza, Zuzeni and Katalize, who were lying like abandoned flowers in the dust. She heard Mukingo shout at his men: "Keep all the virgins and younger women and make them your wives, but bring all Malandela's High Wives here. I have a very pleasant fate awaiting them, together with this hot-blooded Nomikonto here.

Nomikonto watched as more than eight hundred women, all wearing the towering sicolo hairstyles of the High Wives of Malandela, were dragged or pushed roughly towards the clearing near the Great Hut. Some were screaming at the tops of their voices; some were moaning silently to themselves. Others were lost in the mist of unconsciousness and oblivious of what was going on.

"Take these defiled sluts out of there as soon as day breaks, men," said

Vamba coldly. "I want all of them taken far away to the Mahodi Cave and there sealed in alive. I have only sworn not to spill their blood, but not to kill them by entombing them alive. But first clear the kraal of all these stiffened cadavers quickly, and slaughter oxen for a midnight feast."

While the Vamangwe army was busy carrying out Vamba's orders, one of the men came up to him and fell on his knees at his feet. "I beg to tell you, Oh High One, that one of Malandela's wives, Celiwe, escaped into the forest a short while ago."

"Why worry about that?" asked Vamba quietly. "She won't get far with all those lions and leopards prowling through the forest. Go back to work and help the others."

* * * * *

Celiwe was afraid and she was lost—lost in the depths of a dark forest that reverberated with the blood-chilling roars of numerous lions and she knew it was only a matter of time before one of those shaggy beasts found her. She now had one purpose in her fear-numbed brain and that was to find a tree she could climb—and as soon as possible. It was no longer a consolation to her that of all Malandela's wives she alone managed to escape the Vamangwe rapists, for what use is it to escape with one's honour intact and only become a lion's supper immediately afterwards.

Celiwe heard a rustling sound behind her and sank to her knees with a small scream of fear. She lay trembling in the long grass while the rustling came nearer and nearer. One part of her brain was telling her to get up and run while another was telling her to lie very still in the hope that whatever it was would pass her by.

Panic got the better of her, however, and she leapt to her feet with a wild scream and ran madly through the forest with a great leopard in playful pursuit. Celiwe ran like a wild hog, but the leopard reduced the distance between them. With a strength inspired by fear, Celiwe flew like a squirrel up a tall mopani tree—forgetting of course that unlike a lion, leopards can also climb trees. Thus, as she shinned up the tree, the old leopard clawed its way up after her and with a raking paw he tore the long skin skirt off her waist, narrowly missing her flesh.

Celiwe lost her hold and in a most un-feminine way she spun head over heels through the air landing with a thud on the ground in a stunned heap. When eventually she opened her eyes she found herself staring straight in the eyes of the leopard which was lying on its side an arm's length away. A long arrow was buried deep in its evil heart.

"I am saved . . . I am saved!" she thought. But Celiwe was still in for a great surprise, because as she struggled to her feet a gentle arm caught her wrist and pulled her erect. She found herself looking into the high cheeked, square chinned, hard-mouthed face of Dambisa-Luwewe, the witchdoctor woman of Vamba's group.

"You!" gasped Celiwe. "You . . ."

"Do not hate me, little Celiwe. I saved you because you and I must find a way of warning Malandela in the land of the Western Mambo before he starts something he will regret and which will plunge the whole land into great miserv for many years. But first let me tell you that although I have always seemed to work together with Vamba and his friends . . ."

"Seemed to work with them, Dambisa! How can you say, 'although you seemed to work with them'?"

"Give me time, Oh Royal Wife Celiwe," said Dambisa. "Give me a little time to explain. Firstly, I am not a Vamangwe woman. I am not even a witchdoctor woman for that matter. You see, I am a woman from the Baluba nomad tribe and I have been following Mukingo and Vamba for two years to kill them for what they did to my father long ago. They do not know who I am, of course, and like you they mistake me for a Vamangwe woman."

"But it does not make sense," gasped Celiwe. "You have been close enough to Vamba and Mukingo for two years now and if you really wanted to kill them you could have done so long ago. What have you been waiting for?"

To Celiwe's surprise Dambisa's eyes filled with tears as she said: "There is a profound reason for my apparently senseless actions, Celiwe. You see, one of those two creatures has in his secret possession the dreaded stone called the Eye of Odu."

"But that thing only exists in fairy tales and ancient legends."

"The Eye of Odu is no fairy tale, Celiwe. It is a thing that does exist and unless somebody recovers it and returns it to its rightful owner soon, the tribes called Nguni and Western Mambo shall soon be but memories on the shores of bygone—and where there had been kraals full of people, lonely hyænas shall howl."

"These are awful words Dambisa-Luwewe," said Celiwe. "They fill me with fear and a terrible foreboding. Please tell me clearly what you mean."

"Let us first climb up that big tree, as high as we can Celiwe," Dambisa replied, indicating a huge frowning marula a hundred paces away. "Then I shall tell you very clearly what I mean."

Dambisa, who was heavily armed with a lion bow and a quiver full of arrows, as well as a long sharp mpanga, helped the little Celiwe up the tree and soon both women were seated high above the ground with the rough trunk of the tree at their backs and the empty air underneath their dangling feet. Celiwe was eating one of the sour-tasting marula fruits and listening wide-eyed to what Dambisa was telling her.

"In the great fortress known as Zima-Mbje there is a huge hollow idol representing the Ultimate Mother, who is said to be the Mother of the Great Spirit, and those who believe thus, look upon the Great Spirit as the Eternal Piccanin of the Ultimate Mother, because they feel that the Great Spirit holds the Universe like a child holds a toy. Within this great idol is an altar above which sat a small idol of bronze—an idol that always glowed as if red hot because within it was a mysterious stone with peculiar radiating qualities, called the Eye of Odu. Some say the stone is about the size of a baby's head. Very few men have seen this stone outside the bronze idol and those who have, died shortly afterwards. It is said that if one is exposed to the naked radiance of this stone, one's flesh starts to rot while one is still alive, and will come off one's bones in a mass of noisome putrefaction. If a man is exposed to the radiation of the naked stone, he dies. But when the rays are filtered through the body of the bronze idol and fall upon a man, he ceases to be an ordinary man; he becomes a super being, a half-god, and he can then see and do things no ordinary man can see or do. He can even become an immortal.

"Nobody is allowed inside the Idol of the Ultimate Mother and the only people who have had the privilege of exposing themselves to the mysterious filtered radiation of the Idol of the Eye, are the High Chief, the Munumutaba of Luvijiti and his First Wife Namutaba, and also a dozen warrior priests specially appointed to guard the Great Idol.

"It was always said that nobody would ever dare try to steal the glowing bronze idol and the proverb 'as safe as the Bronze Idol' had become one of the most quoted in the empire of Luvijiti.

"My father, Munengu, who was a famous thief and who emigrated from the land of the Baluba far to the north into the empire of the Luvijiti with my mother long before I was born, decided to attempt to steal the well-guarded Bronze Idol—after my mother had playfully taunted him and actually challenged him to steal it as something more spectacular than stealing cattle. Much to my dismay, and my mother's horror, my father succeeded. He drugged the drinking water of the two guards and calmly walked away with the idol while they lay there, prostrate across the entrance to the Great Idol.

"We realised he had gone too far this time, and we fled northwards across the plains with the idol still in our possession. Two months later we crossed the Zambezi into the land of the Nguni. For a few months my father hid the idol in a hole inside our hut. But one day he made the fatal mistake of boasting about his feat in the presence of Mukingo, during a beer-drinking feast.

"Vamba and Mukingo seized him and tortured all the information they wanted out of him. They then staked him to the ground and burnt him by lighting a big fire across his body. That same night they raided our kraal and killed my mother. However, I escaped by hiding in a grain pit.

"Mukingo's raiders found the idol, of course, and took it to their leader who hid it—nobody knows where. Because neither Vamba nor Mukingo had seen me before, I succeeded in posing as a Vamangwe witchdoctor woman and being drawn into their foul schemes against Malandela. My sole purpose was to try and find out where Mukingo had hidden the bronze idol, recover it, and then have Vamba and Mukingo pay for murdering my parents.

"So far I have still failed to discover where the idol is hidden. When it is found, I wish to see to it personally that it is returned to Luvijiti before it falls into the hands of yet more unscrupulous men, and before the spies now swarming all over the land of the Nguni send a messenger to the Munumutaba confirming their suspicion that the ones who stole the idol and now possess it, are in fact in the land of the Nguni. In that case the Munumutaba's armies would invade the land of the Nguni and recover the idol by force. In an open war with the Munumutaba, the Nguni would be exterminated because so powerful are the armies of Luvijiti that nothing on this earth can stand in its way. I do not want the Nguni race to be wiped out simply because of my father's silly prank. I now want Vamba and Mukingo seized and made to tell where they hid the idol before it is too late."

"How do you know that there are Luvijiti spies in the land of the Nguni, Dambisa? And why are you sure that the Munumutaba might attack our land?"

"The man Luva, whom the fools Vamba and Mukingo think is a Vamangwe and a friend, is in fact Muvedu the Cruel, one of the Warrior Priests of Zima-Mbje. I recognised him clearly, but he does not know me. I also recognised one of the lesser priests, Luao, who goes under the false name of Dahodi, and who travels from kraal to kraal in the land of the Nguni selling hippo-fat. The last time I saw Luao he was giving a long message stick to Muvedu."

"Does Luva, or rather Muvedu, know that Vamba and Mukingo have the Eye of Odu in their possession?" asked Celiwe.

"He was not sure until two moons ago, when Mukingo casually made mention of a bronze idol he and Vamba have—hidden away somewhere," replied Dambisa. "Ever since, he has been trying to find out where they kept it. But, like me, he has failed. The message stick I saw Luao, or Dahodi, give to Muvedu, was from the Munumutaba himself and the message read that unless Muvedu succeeds in recovering the idol within two moons, the Munumutaba was going to attack the land of the Nguni and recover it by force. I stole into Luva's hut one night and read the message stick myself, while he was in council with Malandela. That was a moon ago and now I have only one moon left in which to find the cursed idol, before the Munumutaba strikes."

"And," said Celiwe, cutting Dambisa short, "unless we can get to Malandela in time to stop him attacking his brother, the Nguni and the Western Mambo will stand no chance against the invader from the south. They are torn apart by mutual strife."

"Yes, certainly—much depends now upon you and me. Let us pray to the Great Spirit it is not too late already!"

Despairingly Celiwe cried: "Tell me, sister, what are we going to do now?"

"The first thing we have to do as soon as day breaks, is to reach your brother's kraal and ask your brother's two sons to accompany us—together with any other men we can find—into the land of the Western Mambo. We shall all have to ride on the backs of oxen to make the journey. Let us hope we are not too late."

But the two heroic women were already too late—too late by a full day—to avert a terrible disaster and prevent the death of innocent people at the hands of the tempestuous fool named Malandela. Too late by one day were they, to prevent two great tribes from clashing head-on—two great tribes who were unaware of the mutual danger creeping upon them from the south and who were now becoming too filled with bitterness and hatred of each other to unite and face the common enemy in the form of Munumutaba's revengeful hordes.

The coming sun's first rays stain the drifting clouds a red-hot gold and loud in the trees is the song of many birds. Wisps of mist cling like passionate ghosts to the forests and the valleys, and crystal-clear dewdrops glisten on the leaves of every tree. The sun mounts higher in the eastern heavens and slowly the drifting mist is dispelled to the Seven Winds.

On the dew-wet grass thousands of trapdoor spider-webs stand out sharply—mysterious to behold. Alone, an impala emerges from the shadow of a tree, its bulging black eyes glistening in the soft early sunlight. Its shadow stretches long and strange-looking behind it. It has scented something—something whose smell strongly taints the morning breeze . . . human beings!

The lonely impala identifies the smell as that of Death. This it knows from sheer, bitter experience. So back into the friendly embrace of the sheltering bushes and shrubs, and away. It leaps with fluid grace among the dew-bejewelled shrubs. Then it pauses. It peers cautiously over a leafy bush . . . leaps up—and sees them, hundreds of them. But something is wrong here. Most of these human beings are females, and they look very unhappy. Some of them are weeping, others are pleading with the armed men who appear to be deaf. It seems as though all these many human females are captives and being taken somewhere for destruction. The little impala quakes with fear as it senses the evil afloat. It shivers to its very hooves and abruptly turns and flees; it has no wish to be tainted by the aura of evil that radiates from the brains of the leading human beings—like rays from an evil star.

“Waa-ugh! Waa-ugh!”

Old Konde, the baboon, is puzzled. He scratches his red itching buttock and glares malevolently at the strange behaviour of the human beings far down below the great rock on which he is perched, his wife at his side.

“Waa-ugh!” She wants to know ‘why’.

“I do not know,” he barks back, equally puzzled.

Yes . . . he does not know why these queer human beings down there did what he saw them do. They drove a vast number of their females into a great cave that yawns at the base of the mighty mountain on whose lower slopes he and his family have their home. Now those incredible human creatures are working hard to seal the great cave with boulders to prevent the females from getting out. One of them has just run screaming from the cave, but has been knocked down by two of the males, who carried her back into the cave between them. Now the cave is closed and the fifty males pick up their weapons and sticks and return to the forest below.

Konde wonders why so many good-looking and healthy females are being wasted just like that. He knows somehow in his baboon way that his baboon brain will not be able to fathom the situation. ‘Now,’ he thinks, ‘if I had so many females, I would not waste them like that.’

Mukingo was standing at the gate of the Great Kraal he had now taken over as his own, watching hundreds of his Vamangwe warriors building a triple stockade. He had ordered the kraal to be heavily fortified so that ‘not even a mouse can get in’. The new stockades were going to bristle with sharp stakes and barbed metal points. Loud in his ears was the sound of axes biting wood, hammers hitting red-hot metal, beating it into jagged points. Loud in his ears was the chanting, cursing and whistling of two thousand toiling men.

Mukingo saw his cousin Vamba coming up the footpath that wound its way up to the first gate, followed by Luva and the rest of the men who had gone with him to entomb Malandela’s High Wives in the Mahodi cave. Mukingo could see from the hard smile Vamba wore that everything had gone strictly according to plan. But if Vamba was smiling, Mukingo was most uneasy and the dark clouds of foreboding were obstructing the sun of triumph within his evil soul. He had achieved his life's greatest ambition at long last, yet for some reason he was not at all happy. He was now a ruler of men but the beer of triumph had turned acid in his stomach.

He was as uneasy as a locust in a herdboys' frying bowl. He enjoyed being High Chief about as much as one would enjoy a claypot full of bitter mbiza purgative. His expression revealed this clearly to Vamba, whose keen eyes rarely missed anything, however small and insignificant.

Vamba asked in his usual mocking tone: "Why is my great and valiant cousin looking like a bilious hippopotamus this morning? What have you eaten—or what is eating you, Oh Mukingo?"

"Nothing is eating me, Vamba," snarled Mukingo. "I'm only thinking—about many things . . ."

"The only things you are always thinking about are women, Mukingo, and it must be very ugly women you are thinking of now—to bring such an expression on your usual ugly face."

"Vamba," said Mukingo, "I am not well . . . What in the name of the dog with ten heads is thaaaat?"

Everybody turned and looked towards where Mukingo was pointing and they saw what looked like a woman, daubed from head to foot with white clay, coming up the footpath. She seemed to be carrying a stick on which was impaled a man's head. As the fearsome feminine apparition came nearer, everybody except Mukingo, Luva and Vamba, took to their heels and fled like rabbits into the forest.

Slowly, like a sleepwalker, the white-daubed woman approached the three men. Mukingo took a few steps back and then checked himself with a prayer that brought a strange light into the eyes of the man both he and Vamba knew by the name of Luva: "Eye of Odu, defend us!"

The daubed zombie stopped two paces away from the three men and Vamba snatched the message stick out of her hand. The partly decomposed human head fell to the ground with a ghastly thud and Mukingo leapt up with a hoarse scream as a piece of worm-infested flesh splattered over his right foot.

Vamba read the message on the stick slowly and carefully: "Rotten hyæna—we are watching you—one day we shall kill and eat you—you vile deformed killer of his own father—we, the three females and one old blind immortal."

"The Lost Immortal has found us, Oh Vamba," croaked Mukingo. "What are we going to do?"

"Be silent, you whining son of a rabid cur!" grated Vamba. "Remember that we have the Eye of Odu and with it we can rout any immortals, be they lost or found!" And to the vacant-faced painted woman Vamba coldly snapped: "Go and tell whoever it is who sent you that I, Vamba Nyaloti, am waiting for him to come any time he chooses. I may be a rotten hyæna but I still have teeth."

"I . . . will . . . tell . . . him," said the zombie as she turned to go. The three men watched her until she was lost among the distant trees.

Suddenly Vamba spun around and faced Luva, an expression of incredible hatred on his face. The next thing Mukingo heard was the dull cracking thud as Vamba's hissing mpanga sliced Luva's head clean off—sending it tumbling off his shoulders and rolling away, before the body dropped.

"Vamba, you mad fool!" roared Mukingo. "You have killed him, you foul dog! What in the name of a million demons has got into you?"

"Nothing," said Vamba coldly. "Come closer and have a look, you stupid son of a hog!" To Mukingo's great surprise, Vamba ripped the loinskin off the dead body and kicked it over so that it lay on its right side. "Look! Look at this dog's left buttock! Since when have we Vamangwe started worshipping the moon?"

Mukingo's eyes bulged as he stared at the shining tribal scar on the left buttock of the dead body. It represented a crescent moon within a circle of tiny raised nodules representing stars. "Well, fool!" hissed Vamba coldly "What do you say now?"

"He was not one of us," said Mukingo pensively.

"Of course he was not! But what do you make of it?" demanded Vamba.

"I don't know . . ." said Mukingo, scratching his head in puzzlement.

"Listen fool, that tribal scar is very similar to the design on the belly of the glowing idol we have. I think this dog here is of the tribe in the south from which the idol was stolen. He has been trying to steal it back. Now do you understand?"

Mukingo's eyes flashed as an idea swept through his brain like a bolt of lightning. "Vamba—this could mean there are more of these dogs posing as Vamangwe. Come my cousin, we must act now!"

"Someone has started to think at last! What do you aim to do, Mukingo, smell them out?"

"You will soon see." Mukingo flew into the kraal and bellowed at the top of his voice: "To me . . . everybody . . . to me . . . hurry . . . hurry!"

Warriors came running out of the huts and the forest where they had been hiding. They assembled in their hundreds in the centre of the kraal. Then Mukingo raised his voice and once again gave a strange and totally unexpected order: "Every man take off his loinskin!"

Men stared at one another in total disbelief. They shook their heads and some raised their eyebrows in puzzled inquiry. Some even laughed nervously while others looked at both Vamba and Mukingo surreptitiously and tapped their foreheads.

"You heard me!" roared Mukingo. "Every man take off his loinskin!"

"As you say, Oh Chief, growled a heavily built giant named Mbobo. "But tell us, are you going to clean out our bowels with a horn?"

"A truce to your jokes, Mbobo," growled Mukingo. "Do as I say!"

Mbobo tore off his loinskin and playfully tossed it at Mukingo's feet. Then he turned his back to his leader and bowed politely. "I hope my great Chief likes my humble backside."

With roars of laughter the remainder of the Vamangwe followed suit and soon Vamba and Mukingo were being entertained by the rather unnerving sight of thousands of pairs of buttocks lined up in neat rows.

However, one of the men refused to remove his loinskin. He turned and tried to bolt for the gate. But Vamba was too fast for him and soon the two were struggling violently in the dust. Mukingo joined the struggle and knocked the man, a rascal named Dahodi, unconscious with a blow from his great fist. Vamba tore off the man's loinskin and . . . sure enough, as with the dead Luva, there was a crescent scar on his left buttock.

"So, we captured another spy . . . Kill him!" cried Mukingo.

"We shall question him first," said Vamba. "Revive him, Mbobo, and then we shall take him out into the forest to the village of the warrior ants."

Dahodi was revived with water splashed over him by Mbobo. Then he was frogmarched into the forest by Mbobo, Lusu and Mabewe, with Vamba, Mukingo and fifteen other men bringing up the rear. Mukingo carried a heavy rawhide rope with a noose on one end, and he was grinning most fiendishly. At last they came to a great donga in the forest, a donga so old that its walls were heavily overgrown with small bushes and other vegetation. Far down below, at the bottom of the donga, was a cluster of six great anthills swarming with thousands upon thousands of the great tribe of ants called the 'Warriors of Sunrise',—the biggest kind of ant in existence. Dahodi could see human bones bleaching in the sun far below, bones of victims fed long ago to the terrible ants by Malandela, who had discovered this strange colony by accident while still a boy. Dahodi watched as Vamba's men cut down a tall slender tree and trimmed off the branches. Then Mukingo slipped the noose of the long rope under Dahodi's armpits and drew it tight, while Mbobo tied his hands and feet firmly. The other end of the rope was tied to the thin end of the trunk.

The trunk was then carefully thrust over the edge of the great donga by the fifteen men who afterwards sat on the thicker end to prevent it from slipping into the donga completely. Vamba forced the captive towards the edge and pushed him over. He did not fall to the bottom, but dangled in the air with the top of the tallest anthill just brushing the soles of his feet.

"Dahodi," said Vamba coldly, "unless you wish us to feed you to the ants down there you must open your ugly mouth and answer my questions clearly and truthfully."

"I have nothing to tell you," gritted Dahodi through clenched teeth.

The men at the other end of the trunk slowly raised it off the ground with the result that Dahodi sank until he was standing with feet bound securely together in the middle of the cluster of anthills. Dahodi screamed loudly as the dreaded ants swarmed in their hundreds up his legs. Soon it was feeling as if he had been plunged feet first in a pot of boiling water. Blood ran down his legs as the attackers burrowed into his flesh.

"Mercy . . . mercy . . . I shall talk! I shall tell you anything you want to know. But please pull me up!"

"That is good!" exclaimed Mukingo, rubbing his hands gleefully. "Come on, men, lift him up a bit and let him talk first before we free him from his misery." The last words were spoken in a manner so ominous that the men holding the trunk felt an icy coldness in their stomachs. They raised the screaming Dahodi to his original position above the anthills.

"Well, start chattering, my little monkey, and let us hear what you have to tell us," called Vamba pleasantly.

Dahodi told them everything they wanted to know — that his real name was Luao; about his mission; the names of other spies in the land of the Nguni — and concluded by telling them of Munumutaba's intended attack next moon, to recover the bronze idol and to extend his already vast empire at the same time.

When he had finished, Vamba ordered the men holding down the trunk to release it. The luckless spy fell on his back amongst the anthills — and the trunk fell across him, pinning him down, while thousands of ants proceeded to devour him to the bones.

Plans flowed in a wild cataract down the gorges in Vamba's evil mind. As they walked slowly back to the kraal he poured out the results of his quick-thinking brain into the ears of his friends.

"Malandela is a very unpopular chief with his subjects. Many people hate him for his cruelty and stubbornness. There are many amongst the Nguni who will follow us, Mukingo, who will be glad that we have seized power. I know some of them. I will go to their kraals to rally them to our side to greatly reinforce our armies. Listen, Mukingo, we are facing two enemies now — this Munumutaba and Malandela who might return quickly if word gets to him that we have seized his High Seat. We must be strong enough to meet anyone of these two who marches into this land first. You must set a thousand Vamangwe to work immediately making no less than five hundred battle canoes. Let them use the greatest trees they can find. I want our army to be able to resist any invader trying to cross the Zambezi.

"The fate of this land will be decided on the waters of the Zambezi in the case of Munumutaba's attack. And you must set another thousand warriors to work to quadruple the stockades around the Great Kraal. I want every major kraal and village heavily fortified within two or four days. Send messages to every kraal in the land. Now, be quick — we have little time."

Such was Vamba's skill at talking and deceiving people into believing him and Mukingo that by sunset the following day he had succeeded beyond his wildest dreams. He had succeeded in turning thousands of discontented Nguni peasants and war-lords against their lawful king, the tyrant Malandela, who was deeply hated by many of his subjects. Vamba held one great indaba meeting after another. On the one day alone he held three great meetings, each attended by no less than thirty thousand men.

He promised them many things. He bribed some of the war-lords with many cattle from Malandela's many overflowing pens. He even frightened some into joining him by threatening to send his tokoloshes after them.

Thousands of peasants and even nswelaboya outlaws flocked to join the army of Mukingo which soon swelled into twenty thousand fighting men—all sworn to fight for Vamba and Mukingo to the last drop of blood.

Strong forts and lookout posts were soon being built throughout the land. In the absence of the lawful ruler of the Nguni, the Viper that was Vamba tightened his coils around the sceptre of the Nguni tribe, and Malandela's throne was seized from under him while he yet lived.

To gain further popularity for himself, Mukingo abolished the law that said every man in whose kraal three calves were born should send two to the Great Kraal as tribute to the king. Yes, great grew the popularity of Mukingo in those four memorable days after he had seized power in the land of the Nguni. But for some reason, even he could not understand, Mukingo felt more and more uneasy and afraid.

The feeling of uneasiness grew as the days passed. It preyed upon his soul so much that he began to imagine everybody was plotting to murder him and that assassins lurked behind every bush he saw. He refused to eat, yelling that there was poison or voodoo potion in the food. He felt all alone in a world full of thousands of shadowy whispering plotters and sneering assassins. He even killed one of his new wives, believing she was coming into the hut to strangle him as he slept. He tore up his favourite hunting dog with his bare hands, and ate some of its flesh raw, thinking it was Nomikonto creeping up behind him to stab him in the back.

Then, on the tenth night of his reign, he crawled into his hut and sat for a long time with his shoulders sagging and his eyes staring fixedly at the roaring fire in the centre. He suddenly imagined he heard someone moving behind him and shafts of fear tore through him. He spun around and saw his own shadow dancing on the curved wall of the hut. His brain gave it blood-red glaring eyes and a mouth full of jagged teeth. Mukingo was bathed in cold sweat as he leapt to his feet crying, "Who are you?" The shadow gave back no reply and Mukingo drew his mpanga and shrieked: "You have come to kill me—have you? Well, I shall kill you first!"

Mukingo lashed out at the shadow with his mpanga and, of course, the shadow also struck back at him. "You won't kill me . . . I won't let you . . .!"

Bundles of grass flew in all directions as the madman's mpanga slashed the hut to pieces around him. Leaping from wall to wall, Mukingo chased his own shadow around the hut, hacking and hewing at what he thought was an assassin lashing equally fiercely at himself. Then, in his frenzy of madness, Mukingo hacked down the three posts that supported the domed roof of the hut and it collapsed about his ears with a great sigh. Mukingo was borne down by the weight of the grass onto the fireplace and died screaming in the inferno that followed when the dry grass caught fire and burnt fiercely, fanned by a brisk night breeze.

The following day Vamba proclaimed himself chief of the Vamangwe, which included the Nguni.

FROM THE CLAWS OF DEATH

WHILE Vamba and Mukingo were busy torturing the Luvijiti spy Dahodi in the donga of the warrior ants, much was happening to Nomikonto and the eight hundred and fifty Royal Wives whom they had entombed alive in the great Mahodi cave. It was dark, damp and hot in the cave and the women were crammed with barely room in which to move. Gradually the humid air grew foul for human lungs. The gasping women had long since abandoned their fruitless efforts at moving the great rocks that sealed the mouth of the cave and they no longer had the breath with which to scream for help. Nomikonto knew she was looking in the face of the cruellest death any human being can ever die, and she was terribly frightened. It is one thing to think about death; facing it is another. Princess Nomikonto wanted to live. She did not have the courage to resign herself to the dark embrace of death as the laws of the tribes say one should, and as Muxakaza and the other older women had advised her to do. The blanketing fog of wet and airless heat was heavy on her lungs and nostrils and in her gasping she only sucked in more of the foul air.

Her head ached dully and there was a continuous noise within her brain now. The moaning, gasping women had all fallen and lay in a great pile at Nomikonto's feet—the top ones crushing and smothering those below. Nomikonto alone was standing now, or doing her best to stand by pressing her back against the rough rock and even trying the impossible feat of digging her fingers into its cruel unyielding surface. She knew she did not have long to go—she actually felt herself falling . . . falling . . .

'No . . . I cannot die . . . I cannot just lie down and die. I am Nomikonto—child of a warrior king.'

Slowly, painfully, the girl staggered to her feet and started moving along the walls of the great cave—stumbling over the bodies of her fellow victims, some of whom were still choking and struggling violently on the ground while others were already lying very still . . . lifeless.

'No . . . no!' moaned Nomikonto to herself, 'We can't die like this—there must be a way . . .'

How long she kept on edging her way along the side of the cave she could not tell. The cave was indeed very big. Something gave her the strength to fight on and that something was a small flame that kindled itself in her subconscious mind—a flame that brought back to her memory an old legend she had once heard as a child. And the legend was concerned with the very cave in which she now faced death.

On she went, edging her way along the rocks which cut and bruised her back and broke the nails of her fingers . . .

Then, suddenly she felt a wide cleft between two different portions of rock and pouring through this cleft came a steady stream of life-giving air. She pushed her face into the space and took breath after breath of the cool living air.

She breathed in and out faster and faster—and then found her voice: "Air, air, air!"

Filled with new strength and hope—and madness—the girl tried to enlarge the cleft by pulling, yes, tugging to pull the rocks apart. But the great masses of granite held fast. Then she tried to push them apart—and there came a faint crackling. She actually felt the rock on the side move ever so slightly.

With fresh hope, the woman pushed with all her might and what felt like a big monstrous boulder again moved almost imperceptibly. There was another sudden sound as an unseen rock, dislodged by the slight movement, fell and thudded into the ground an arm's length away to her right. She shuddered at her narrow escape but immediately continued pushing against the slowly yielding boulder. Another rock was dislodged and now a jet of cold air poured into the cave. "We are saved, we are saved!"

This cry reached the other women and passed from one to another of those who were still conscious. Bodies came to life and started crawling across other bodies—following in the direction of the gush of fresh air. "Help! Help me . . . do not leave me . . . I am not dead! But I cannot get up . . . I cannot move . . .!"

Nomikonto heard the cacophony of sounds and struggles and called out: "This is Nomikonto here. All those able to move, help those still alive and work your way across in this direction. I command you, in the name of the High One, Malandela!"

"It shall be done, Oh my Royal sister-in-law," came the husky voice of the First Queen Muxakaza. "But where in the name of the great spirit does all this air come from?"

"It seems that the old legends were right, Oh Muxakaza," said Nomikonto. "This cave is one of the entrances to the underground river Lulungwa-Mangakatsi which flows northwards into the great lake Nyanza. The rush of air comes from that terrible river—as does the noise."

"But how did you manage to let the air in, Oh High One," asked Katazile out of the dark.

"I had to push this big rock a little," the princess replied. "And I think if many of us can push against it, we might roll it completely away."

"How big is it?"

"About the size of a half-grown elephant. But it is round and can be rolled aside."

"All women to the High Princess," shouted the First Queen. "All women able to do something, move across to the Royal Child and help her with the rock. I am going back to help the others who are still unconscious—and I need two to give me a hand."

Women moved in the darkness. One of them blew her nose noisily and spat. There were moans from those regaining consciousness amongst the pile of bodies on the floor. One sobbed piteously in the dark: "Mother, do not let me die . . . help me . . . help me . . ."

Women groped their way towards Nomikonto and soon fifty hands were placed on the great rock to push it back. "Lord of my fathers!" cried one of the women, the tall, broad-hipped and beautiful Lulamani, the dancer, also nicknamed Ncelebana (man-hungry harlot) by her fellow Royal Wives because of her unquenchable thirst for the love-mat. "By the Tree of Life's kiss what is this here on the rock?"

"What is it, Lulamani?" asked Nomikonto.

"It is an inscription, Royal One—an inscription cut deep into the rock."

"Can you trace its meaning with your fingers?" asked Nomikonto.

"Wait, let me feel. No, I cannot make out any of these ----- incestuous and defiled signs"

"Stop using dirty words, you man-hungry slut," cried Nomikonto. "You are the only one of us who can read inscriptions on rocks and drums. Come on, read it!"

"Seduce me, Oh crocodiles," swore Lulamani vehemently. "I think . . . I think I can make out some of the adulterous things."

"Well, tell us what the inscriptions say!"

Lulamani traced out sign after sign which, although they had apparently been cut into the rock tens of thousands of years ago by men who spoke the First Language—the language from which all tribal languages sprang—could still be deciphered by anyone from any tribe who had been trained to read them.

Lulamani eventually succeeded in deciphering all the characters and could read the message straight (follow the illustrations): "Future generations, we are warning you. There is much secret evil behind this round rock—do not touch it. We, the last two alive of the Children of the Star, a male and female, are warning you. We who are to die tomorrow, are warning you all."

"Oh my father!" gasped Nomikonto.

"Who were they?" asked Katazile. "Who were the Children of the Star?"

"It is one of the forbidden stories which no one must retell," said Lulamani. "And I shall tell it to you on the understanding that you will never repeat it to anyone else if we get out of here alive."

"If we get out alive," said Nomikonto.

"The Children of the Star were a tribe that existed long before the coming of the Strange Ones. They were a tribe of Wizards who spent their lives looking for things we must not try to know and they lived in a Forbidden Valley near the land of the Nyasa. The great Goddess Ma destroyed the Forbidden Valley with Muotamkulu, the Great Fire, after the Children of the Star had started creating a Goddess for themselves—a Goddess who was the most perfect being ever created in the Universe."

"What?" cried Nomikonto. "The Children of the Star created a Goddess?"

"Yes," said Lulamani, "and this so angered the Goddess Ma that she destroyed the Children of the Star utterly with disease and fire. All the artificial animals they created were destroyed as well, except those we know today as the quagga, the giraffe and the okapi, which somehow escaped destruction and now mingle freely with other animals in the forest."

"So that is why the giraffe has no voice!" exclaimed Katazile. "Because it is man-made and not god-made!"

EVIL BEHIND ROCK

"Yes, and that is why the okapis and quaggas are such imperfect and strange-looking beasts. Their ancestors were not created by the Tree of Life."

"But why do we regard these beasts as sacred then?" asked the inquisitive Katazile.

"Because through them we commemorate the Children of the Star, who were the only human beings ever created who reached the Peak of Ultimate Perfection. They had so evolved themselves that they were free from hatred, fear, greed, lust, let alone disease. They were more perfect than Ma herself the First Goddess. That is why they were utterly destroyed. The Universe is no place for Perfection and in the eyes of the Great Spirit, Perfection is as bad as Evil. Once a race has reached Ultimate Perfection it automatically loses its purpose—like a runner who stops when he has reached his goal as there is no purpose in continuing."

"But what evil can there be behind this rock?" demanded Nomikonto. "We cannot stay here and die of hunger and thirst. We must try and find a way out of here and the only way is beyond this rock."

"We might be lost forever in the underground tunnels through which the Hidden River flows, Princess," answered Lulamani soberly. "But I think a quick death is better than a slow one through hunger and thirst."

"It is said there are places where the Hidden River flows for short distances through deep gorges open to the sky before it disappears underground again, Lulamani," said Nomikonto. "If we find we can walk along the banks of the Hidden River, we might find such a place."

"Assuming that the Hidden River has banks along which we can walk," responded Lulamani quietly.

"But after all, what have we to lose by trying? We would only lose our man-defiled bodies anyway," said Nomikonto.

"I do not consider myself defiled simply because a few Vamangwe took me by force," smiled Lulamani.

"You filthy slut! You are without womanly pride and honour," shrieked Nomikonto.

"You can call me a dirty slut, Oh Royal Child, but I am a far better woman than you in many ways. I have learnt to face life's hardships with a smile. I do not surround myself with a shell of artificial pride. Neither do I lay claim to an imaginary honour and dignity I do not possess. Thus no amount of abuse from men would ever make me feel deprived of things that I only imagine I have.

"You are just the opposite—you are now prepared to throw your young life away simply because you lost imaginary honour at the hands of Mukingo who, after all, only did to you what some man would have done sooner or later, and who only did to you what you were created for.

"People like you never last long in this cruel world. You are too stiff-necked to bow your head to the tempest of life. You are like a wretched little tree that tries to resist the fury of the storm instead of yielding to it gracefully and surviving. Unless you are capable of sinking your imaginary pride occasionally in the course of your life, you might find yourself taking a mighty jump over a precipice one day, so intolerable will your life soon become!"

Nomikonto said nothing. She knew there was nothing to say, because Lulamani was right. She knew that in spite of Lulamani's unnatural hunger for men, she was the wisest woman who ever walked the earth. Every word that fell from her sensuous lips was a word of wisdom deeper than lake Nyanza. Lulamani was an expert at making people face the facts of life instead of deceiving themselves. Her words opened the eyes of those who deluded themselves and they also brought joy to those in sorrow and hope to those in despair.

In the darkness of despair and sorrow, Lulamani always shone like a Star of Hope, just as she outshone all women under the sun when it came to the hour of love. "Well, what are we going to do now?" said Nomikonto after a long pause. "Do we stay here or do we push this rock away and challenge the darkness beyond?"

"Evil harms only those who look for it—at least, that is what the Old Ones say," said Lulamani. "I say that we push the rock away and take our chance in the dark beyond. If there is anything evil lurking behind this rock it can only harm us if we look for it. We are not looking for evil or for secrets of the past; we are only interested in finding our way out of this evil place."

Of the eight hundred and fifty women who had been urged at spearpoint by Vamba and his men into the Mahodi cave, only five hundred and sixteen were left alive; the rest were lying very still in the dust of the great cave—sleeping the last sleep from which there could be no awakening.

Muxakaza tried again and again to revive many of them, but in vain. The beautiful albino queen wept continuously as she groped her way from body to body, trying her best to shake life into each one, feeling for the beat of a heart here and there and screaming loudly when she found that the heart was stilled for all time. She let out a loud wail of surprise when she found that one woman had committed suicide by stabbing herself with a small knife which she must have smuggled in under her skin skirt.

"Withdraw the knife from the body," said Nomikonto. "We might need it."

At a command from Nomikonto the women who had come forward to help her placed their hands and shoulders once more against the rock and pushed with all their combined effort. They pushed, relaxed, pushed again—and yet again. Each time they pushed they felt the rock give way a little more.

Suddenly it yielded. It rolled away from the straining women, causing many to lose their balance and fall forward on their faces in the darkness. Then there came an ominous rumble from the roof of the cave, a sound that told of great slabs about to collapse on the heads of the sweating women. "Get back . . . get back! Run for your lives!" shrieked Nomikonto.

"The defiled rocks want to crush us," cried Lulamani. "Run for your unclean lives, you foul bitches!"

There was a noise like a million thunders—one continuous hellish roar as vast slabs of the roof crashed to the floor. A great gust of air hurled many of the women across to the far side of the cave like so many goatskin dolls. The ground underfoot shook and heaved under the incredible blows it received, while showers of living sparks flew in all directions. Clouds of smothering dust billowed in the darkness while sharp rocks darted from the great roof—splinters that dropped like spears, penetrating skulls and bodies and pinning them to the ground. Shrieks of agony and fear in that tumult of sound were like squeaks from newborn mice against the peal of midsummer thunder.

Gradually the fury of the rocks spent itself. There was still an occasional thud—then, silence. It was a long agonising silence, interrupted only by a hiss of breath escaping from a crushed and mangled body—and a low moan here and there.

At last a husky voice sounded hollow in the darkness: "This is the First Wife Muxakaza . . . this is the First Wife. Please will anyone still alive call out."

"Princess Nomikonto here," came another voice. "I am shaken but unhurt."

Another throaty and musical voice floated out of the dark: "Likewise here . . . it will take more than an incestuous rock to kill me. I'm destined to live till I manage to make an adulterer of your future husband, Oh Nomikonto."

"Is that you, Lulamani?"

"It is. You weren't expecting me to get killed by any chance, were you?"

"As a matter of fact I was," said Muxakaza, forcing a nervous laugh.

After that, other women called out and identified themselves and, to Nomikonto's horror, only two hundred and twenty-eight women were left alive—and the inquisitive, talkative Katazile was among the dead.

Nomikonto wept silently by herself while Muxakaza groped among the rocks in the darkness to find the badly wounded women and those pinned down by the rocks with their legs or arms crushed. She put them out of their misery by plunging the little knife into their still pulsing hearts. After this, the survivors made a careful search of the dark cave for any there might be who were lying unconscious. But they found none.

It was during this search that one of the women came upon something most unusual which greatly helped them in their journey—their fantastic and perilous journey along the bank of the terrible river Lulungwa-Mangakatsi, deep, deep down in the bowels of the earth. Duduza smelt burning hide and saw a red glow, a fiery patch that was being fanned by the strong draught in the cave into small flickering flames. A spark from the falling rocks had landed on the skin skirt of a dead woman and been miraculously fanned into a steady smouldering fire. Duduza shouted to Nomikonto and reported her strange find.

It did not take the three leading women long to realise that they now had fire to light them on their way. Soon after Nomikonto had torn the skirt off the dead woman and whirled it round and about to fan the smouldering patch into flame, a handsome fire was burning in one corner of the cave. Scores of willing hands were collecting bundles of dry grass that had blown into the cave in the course of years and torches were being made by rolling these bundles into torn pieces of skirt.

Two hundred and twenty-eight women had to sacrifice their skirts to make two torches each. At last Nomikonto, Lulamani and Muxakaza, each carrying a lighted torch (the others carrying two unlit spares each) led the way down the gently sloping tunnel along which the great inscribed boulder had rolled—down, and still farther down, into the very womb of the earth.

There was a loud roar like that of a thousand waterfalls in the ears of the women and great gusts of wind threatened to blow out the three flickering torches. Each woman knew they were nearing the dreaded Lulungwa-Mangakatsi and there was fear in every pulsing heart. In the dull light of the flickering torches, one could see clearly the expressions of horror and barely repressed panic on the faces of the women. One could see heaving chests and the sweat of pure terror glistening on each dark-brown, ebony-black, yellowish-brown, and even one albino-pink face.

The leading women emerged from the narrow sloping tunnel on to a wide ledge that ran along one side of a cavern so vast that its roof was lost in the darkness above, and it seemed to carry on like a tunnel of incredible size that twisted and turned over unbelievable distances deep under the earth. The river flowed far down below the ledge on which the women stood, gazing down with awe and horror.

"Let us go," cried Nomikonto above the roar of the dreaded Lulungwa-Mangakatsi. "Follow me . . . let us keep moving."

Like soulless puppets the women followed the sister of their husband. To their left, far below, roared the Hidden River and to their right towered a vertical face of ugly scowling rock which rose and was lost in the darkness above. They proceeded with this perilous march, like a long serpent, for a period that felt like many days. In the course of this journey two of the women sank to the ground exhausted from hunger and injuries. They had to be left behind to their fate. Another woman went mad and pushed three others over the ledge before Muxakaza could stab her to death and dispose of her in the same way.

At one time the women came to a place where part of the ledge had collapsed into the river, leaving only a narrow part very close to the rock face. Here, Nomikonto ordered the women to get down on their stomachs and crawl across one by one. And here death claimed five of the women, all having lost their nerve and falling to their doom in the river below.

After that the nightmarish journey continued without further incident for another long stretch of time, in which the women's endurance was systematically drained away. Eventually they all decided to lie down on the ground for a rest, and await death for that matter, as they could walk no farther.

To be entombed in a cave with the only known exit blocked and to proceed with reconnoitring alternative unknown routes that might lead to another exit, is an experience both hazardous and nightmarish. The experiences of Malandela's wives have been reconstructed from numerous tales, stories, legends and songs that have survived for so many generations. This account may be more factual—historically true—than meets the eye. If we should accept as a historical fact that Malandela's wives were actually entombed under circumstances not greatly different from those depicted, and we are prepared to accept the size of his seraglio, which is not unusual, we may accept even more readily that some of these wives had actually seen daylight again.

If not, their experience inside the cave must have been improvised by subsequent storytellers, in which case the entire account is an improvisation. Those that survived would almost certainly have related widely differing accounts, influenced by individual imagination. Future legends on which the present is based, are a glossary of those accounts that sounded most fascinating. The author has sketched so far a picture designed to illustrate the hazardous part of the women's various experiences and this picture is physically possible at least, if not historically true. On subsequent pages the author proceeds to sketch their nightmarish experiences, also based on legends. However, it would appear that a great deal of mythology crept into the generalised legendary story that was subsequently formulated. Conversely, the generalised story had in the course of time contributed a further chapter to an already existing and colourful mythology.

Lulamani was the first to see the monster creeping upon the women from behind. She was the only woman who still had a torch firmly in her hand. Unlike the others, who were all lying down, some sleeping, she was sitting upright and she saw the nightmare horror creep upon them from the dismal darkness.

The monster was bigger than the largest elephant and it was covered all over with scales that looked more like shards of granite than ordinary scales. It had two round heads, each with yellow-luminous and split-pupilled eyes, and each head was mounted on a separate long scaly neck remotely resembling that of a giraffe. Under the luminous eyes of each head snarled a reddish mouth with countless fangs. It had four webbed, scaly arms and it walked on two elephantine hindlegs. It had a tail whose length was lost in the darkness beyond.

Lulamani stared at the horrible thing in utter disbelief and watched paralyzed as it picked up four of the sleeping women and hurled them into the river below, before stooping to pick up four more. She then hurled one of the burning torches straight at the drooling mouth of one of the heads and had the satisfaction of seeing the smoky brand vanish into that vast and terrible cavity.

The monster uttered a roar and a bellow which shook the entire cavern and temporarily drowned even the roar of the river. The women awoke and more than two hundred pairs of eyes widened as they saw the monster. Fear lent great strength to the legs of all the women as they rose as one, and ran as they had never run in all their lives. They ran like the very wind, with Muxakaza and Nomikonto leading. Lulamani was now in the rear, her flaming torch still clutched firmly in her hand.

The monster was after them, its eyes ablaze with murderous hatred and its two mouths wide open, displaying terrible teeth. The monster gained on Lulamani and it was only twenty paces behind her when the ledge collapsed under its great weight. It vanished into the dark depths with loud trumpeting screams of fear. There was a tremendous splash far below and the unearthly creature was no more—but the women kept on running as if the ghost of the monster was still after them.

* * * * *

There were exactly two hundred of them left now and they were all in the last stages of exhaustion. They were no longer walking erect, but were crawling on hands and knees like babies. Only the strongest, swiftest and bravest of them had survived, and now it looked as if death would soon claim all of them at once. The strongest wish in every heart was now to die—among, and together, with friends.

They had come to a place where the river formed a great lake deep in the core of the earth and they were now in that mysterious land known as the Nether Earth, or the Second Earth, which some say will one day rise again to the surface while our earth will sink below. This New Earth, our Tribal storytellers say, will be populated with creatures more beautiful and far wiser than this human race.

Although the women had long since lost their torches, there was plenty of light where they now were, because far away across the great lake mighty volcanoes were belching fire and smoke, lighting up the entire, fabulous landscape. Only mossy crystalline grass and bronzy trees without leaves grew in this Nether World, and there were no animals of any description. A deep peaceful silence lay over everything and the living air was charged with a strange vitality and a pleasant scent.

Nomikonto stretched her tired body on the transparent mossy grass and looked at the other women, who followed her example. They had all come a very long way and could go no farther. They all chose this fantastically beautiful and pleasant place as the one in which to lie down and gently die.

But there came to their ears a quiet tender voice, across the scented air—a voice that belonged to someone or something which was the very pillar of mercy and love. It filled the tired women with awe and reverence.

“My children, my much tired, exhausted children, you do not belong here. Your lives will be of great value in the service of your people in the Upper World. You must live to become the cressets that light the way of the Tribes you belong to. Come to me and I will restore your strength and help you find your way back to the Upper World once more.”

“Who . . . where are you?” stammered Nomikonto, struggling to her feet.

“I am Lufiti-Ogo,” answered the voice, “and if you will promise me not to be repelled by what you will see, I shall make myself visible to you.”

“Repelled by what we shall see!” exclaimed Lulamani. “How can one who possesses such a beautiful voice be repulsive?”

“I am not ugly, but I am different from what you look like. You see, I was created by men who had totally different standards of beauty, tens of thousands of years ago.”

“You mean you are the Star Mother?” gasped Lulamani.

“Yes, I am the Star Mother.”

“Who is she?” whispered Nomikonto.

“She is the Fugitive Goddess, created by the Children of the Star,” replied Lulamani in an awed whisper. “The most perfect being ever created in the Universe.”

“Goddess, please to show yourself,” said one of the women, Namulembu of the Vamangwe, in spirit language, “Show yourself and let us fall on our knees and worship you.”

“Do not call me a Goddess,” said the voice gently. “I do not deserve that title. Observe, I am now going to make myself visible.”

The creature was as tall as a man and looked for all the world like a cross between a human being and a very pleasantly beautiful Chimbandzi, or Ngangi ape. She had a smallish head and the receding chin of the higher primates. She had thin lips and a human mouth around the corners of which hovered the faintest ghost of a most pleasant smile. Her eyes, set deeply under heavy brows, were soft and alive with wisdom—far beyond that of men. Her shoulders were as wide as that of a giant. Her arms were long and slender and her beautiful hands were crowned with graceful claw-like nails. Her broad chest was weighted down by two enormous breasts and it seemed to Nomikonto that those breasts could easily nurse the babies of a whole tribe. She had the narrow waist and the broad hips of a good child-bearing woman.

Without a word the Great Lufiti-Ogo sat down on a rock and beckoned Nomikonto to come to her, which the Nguni princess promptly did, in spite of her aching feet and tired body. The Goddess reached out a powerful arm and lifted the princess off the ground on to her lap as if she were a baby. Although somewhat ape-like in certain respects when seen from a distance, Nomikonto now noticed that her skin was human-like, smooth, and free of hair, except for a soft shiny black attractive covering like a heavy mane across her head and reaching down to between her shoulder blades. She also saw that the skin of the Goddess was a yellowish red-brown and that her eyes were black.

The princess soon discovered the object of the Goddess's hospitality. She was being encouraged by the Goddess to allow herself to be nursed like a baby. Needless to say, the princess considered this a most embarrassing experience, as did the other women who watched in great amazement. However, the others were given their turns and eventually all two hundred had had their strength restored, like so many newly fed babies.

"Rest now, lie down and sleep, all of you," said the Ogo.

The women all lay down and slept heavily. For how long they slept they did not know, and could not care.

Eventually Lulamani found herself wide awake with the Ogo sitting beside her and looking intently down at her. "You are a woman with much to hide. Tell me, you who are not what you seem to be—what seek you in the land of the Nguni?"

Lulamani gasped. Tears burst in a flood from the springs that were her eyes and she asked in a trembling voice: "You know who I am, Great Ogo?"

"I am the Ogo," said the Primate Goddess. "I see everything and I know everything. I know who you are and what you are. All I wish to do is to cure you of the fear and the guilt that is devouring your soul—the fear and the guilt you are trying to hide under a cloak of cheerfulness. The other women are still asleep and you need not fear that they will learn your secret. Confide in me, my child, and unburden your chest of the heavy weight that lies within.

"I would rather unburden my chest in front of all my friends, Oh Great Ogo," decided Lulamani courageously. "I have gone through much evil, side by side with them, and they are now like sisters to me. As you say, Oh Great Ogo, I must unburden my chest of what it contains. But I ask only to make a full confession before my friends, and let them decide what to do with me."

"You are under my wing now, Lulamani," said the Ogo. "You shall not be harmed in any way because very soon you are going to help in saving thousands of human lives and your name shall be sung and spoken about for many generations to come by singers and storytellers of a thousand tribes. You, Oh Lulamani, shall save the Nguni nation from annihilation very soon. I, the Ogo, salute you here and now. Hail, heroine of the River! Hail, saviour of thousands!"

Lulamani was stunned by the Goddess's prophesy. What did all this mean? She did not know it then, but she was going to find out after two moons had gone by.

Lulamani felt the arrows of fear as she stood facing the women with whom she had endured and suffered so much. She saw the curiosity and expectancy written on the face of each of them. She opened her mouth to speak, but no words came. She tried again and once more failed. Then at last she looked appealing at the Ogo and whispered: "I do not know how to begin."

"Then I shall help you, my daughter," said the Ogo. "My children, Lulamani here has something to tell you, but she cannot summon enough courage to do so, and therefore I will help her. You have always known her as Lulamani and had taken it for granted she was a Nguni. You calmly accepted her as a fellow Royal Wife, a rival in marriage. She is none of these things. She is the true Queen of the Empire of Luvijiti. She was deposed by the present Munumutaba years ago and had to flee for her life. She fled into the land of the Nguni and was adopted by an old Nguni man and his wife who also swore to keep her true identity a secret and who gave her a new name. Afterwards they married her off to Malandela. Apart from this, she whom you know as Lulamani also suffers from that disease which must never be mentioned by name!"

"What!" cried Muxakaza, the First Queen. "Gods of my fathers, that explains everything!"

"That explains what, Oh Great First Wife?" asked Nomikonto.

"It explains why Lulamani always used to invent every kind of excuse and low trick to avoid having to go and share the love-mat with Malandela when her turn came every sixth moon of the year!" cried Muxakaza. "I always wondered why she, who seemed so fond of the love-mat and always eager to flirt with any man, young or old, who came near her, should always come up with some excuse or other when her turn came to spend the night with the High Chief. It is very lucky for her that Malandela is not such a hot-blooded man—she would have been found out long ago, and burnt alive!"

"My children," said the Ogo, "in this beautiful fallen woman you see a weapon that will win the great war and save the Nguni tribe from annihilation. Do not scorn her; look well upon your fallen saviour."

"The fallen saviour!" The name re-echoed within the minds of all the women and each one of them repeated it again and yet again to herself silently. It was a name to be used by a thousand storytellers from a thousand tribes for a thousand years to come; it was a name to be used by countless poets and by countless singers whenever they referred to Lulamani or, to give her the name by which she would henceforth be known, Maneruana, the fallen saviour.

"When the warriors have fought until they can fight no more," said the Ogo, "when spears have drunk blood until they can drink no more, and when the knobkieries are broken and the battle-axes are blunted, and the plains littered with the bodies of men, this woman will throw one spear and stab the enemy to the heart. His warriors will be scattered to the Seven Winds. Behold, this is our beautiful spear—this our Maneruana! Look well upon her, Oh my children, look at her beauty. Before I cure her of her secret illness, Maneruana shall bring a proud and insolent man and a proud empire of murdering dogs hurtling to the ground. Come, my children, follow me. We must join forces with the old blind and devouring eagle whom we must help to restore peace to the land of the Mambo and the Nguni."

The women raised a loud acclamation and all took turns in kissing Lulama-Maneruana's forehead, breasts and cheeks. Then they turned and followed the Great Ogo across the plains of the Nether World where crystal grass and leafless bronze trees grow.

After a long journey the Ogo suddenly stopped and took a few steps backward, fear creeping into her eyes. "Get back, my children, get back," she shouted.

The women in front immediately fell back on those behind them as some huge and incredibly evil-looking creature emerged from behind a huge outcrop of rock. This creature could best be described as a great pile of rubbish. The growth over his surface, whether supposed to be hair or not, had the appearance of drift grass deposited on branches of trees by flood waters. But this great pile had two legs and two arms—and a voice. "Where are you going?" he asked.

"I am taking these earthly human beings back to the Upper World . . . and I am going there myself."

"Who gave you permission to leave the Nether World?"

"No one, Oh great Heap of Rubbish," answered Lufiti-Ogo. "I am tired of this world and I want to leave it forever."

"You will not leave this world—you will stay here," said the Heap.

"Never!"

"If you try to leave this world against my command, I shall destroy you."

"You try . . ."

The Demon and the Goddess immediately came to grips in the presence of the women who stood watching in wide-eyed awe. Then suddenly a luminous patch appeared in front of the women, hovering a thumb's length above the crystal grass. "Follow that light patch, it will guide you—run!" the Ogo panted.

The women ran like the wind. They ran like impala through the silent forests of mineral trees and metal shrubs with ruby-centred and diamond-petalled flowers. The fallen saviour, whom all now knew as Lulama-Maneruana, looked once over her shoulder and saw the Demon carry the Goddess away like a husband who forcibly carries home a stubborn and wayward wife. 'Poor Ogo,' she thought, and then rejoined the rest of the women.

The little red luminous patch led them into the yawning mouth of a cave under a mountainous wall of black rock—a cave which seemed to conceal many evil secrets in its dark, brooding depths. Before it entered the cave, a flute-like voice spoke from the luminous patch: "Keep close together — do not get left behind. Many dangers await us in here. Follow me."

Into the cave went the terrified women and on through echoing tunnels where dark shapes with luminous eyes scuttled away into the darkness around the glowing patch. Great shapes resembling bats with horns instead of ears flew past the terrified women.

Then to the nostrils of the women came a smell so foul that their heads started spinning. By the light from the luminous patch the women saw a huge beast, an elephant in size but in appearance a cross between a bull and a crocodile. "Be very silent now," a whisper came from the luminous patch. "That is the Burumatara, the Old Bull, who is the father of all demons. He mated with the Goddess of Evil, Watamaraka, to produce certain races of men, and he is physically the father of all tokoloshes."

But the Burumatara had seen them and with a swish of his scaly crocodile tail and a toss of his great bull-like horned head he bellowed: "What are you puny things and whence are you? And why are you trespassing in the realm of Burumatara?"

"We are going back to the world we belong to, Burumatara," replied the Queen Muxakaza at length.

"No one passes my kingdom without paying a tribute. I want ten of the fattest and healthiest of you to remain here. I am tired of eating rocks. The rest can then proceed on their way."

It was here that the Princess Nomikonto, who was by far the fattest and the healthiest of them all, did a very shameful thing. She calmly knocked ten others unconscious with blows of her powerful fist, and they were left behind. It is from this legendary incident that the saying sprang: "When the bugle of pleasure calls from within the kraal of Life, I shall go in first—but when the drum of death groans from within the kraal, please, Oh Life, would you care to go first."

This saying has been made into a song and the warriors sing it when going into battle. And it is always sung with a long refrain of vulgar epithets directed to those at home who start wars and then hide, leaving others to fight.

The little luminous patch led the women on and on through dark tunnels full of unseen evil and where ghostly shapes hooted and gibbered at them as they passed. Then at last the greatly decimated group of women emerged into a vast cavern of incredible dimensions. This cavern seemed to be filled with tens of thousands, if not millions, of giant luminous butterflies. Some were soaring around in clouds that vanished in the expanse above, while fresh ones emerged in their thousands from crevasses in the floor.

"These are the souls of men and women," explained the glowing patch. "Those that you see rising from the floor are souls of people who have just died. They come here first to await their turn to be reincarnated into the animals and birds of the Upper World. You are beholding the knot in the Cycle of Life, and it is here that you experience the truth of the philosophy that Life is but Death and Death is but Life. One only lives to die, and dies to live again."

They proceeded farther and the voice came again from the luminous patch: "Although we are nearing the end of our journey, there are still many dangers ahead. I must now return to my mother and father whom you last saw in less co-operative spirit, there where I first joined you. Perhaps I should tell you that my father is not what he looks; he is, in fact, the Spirit of Nature.

"But fate is cruel to you, Oh daughters of men! Soon you are going to be faced with the strangest choice that any human being ever had to make as a price to re-entry in your world. As soon as I depart, three creatures will present themselves to you—a dove, an eagle and a bat. You will have to decide individually which of these creatures should guide you back to your world. One will lead you there safely; another will lead you to total annihilation, while the third may lead you through to your world, but you will then have become transformed into something different. I leave you to make your own choice and I cannot advise you on which will lead you where!

"Now, I can sense also evil approaching you from behind. Take that tunnel and run for your lives! Hurry, and try to reach the Grey Land where your three guides are waiting. There is a Damned One after you!"

A Damned One is a soul, one of very few, condemned to roam the dark depths of Eternity forever, without being allowed to reincarnate, because of a great evil it had committed against the Universe.

After the glowing patch had vanished the women dashed into the tunnel indicated. But they were not quick enough. A large black butterfly with wings that glowed an intense violet, overtook them, descending on the back of Muxakaza—and dissolving itself into her body. Every woman clearly understood the meaning of what they witnessed.

When Muxakaza, who was no longer Muxakaza, rejoined the other women in the valley of that strange land, halfway between the Nether World and the Upper World and known as the Grey Land, the fallen saviour Lulama-Maneruana saw that she had changed. The beauty of the Albino Queen, which had been the beauty of a self-respecting, dignified woman, was now the brazen beauty of a shameless slut. Even her matronly figure had changed into that of a voluptuous "Black River harlot". She, who had been hailed as the most beautiful woman in the land of the Nguni, was soon to be cursed as the worst slut that ever defiled the history of any tribe.

From the pitch-black depths of the ash-grey land there appeared a white dove, a black eagle and a giant bat. Lulama-Maneruana and Nomikonto, together with a number of the other women, promptly chose the proud eagle. Ninety, led by the Vamangwe, Namulembu, chose to follow the bat. The remaining fifty, led by Muxakaza, Zuzeni and Notemba, elected to follow the white dove. There was fear in every heart. Who had made the right choice? They all knew that one group was doomed to complete annihilation—but which?

HURL BACK THE WAR SPEAR

THE eyes of Lulama-Maneruana slowly opened. Above her were the pale blue sky and the trees of the Upper World, which she knew and loved so well. A cool breeze whispered in the long grass and the ground was wet under her from the previous night's rain.

The first thought that came to her mind was: we have succeeded, but what about the others?

She leapt to her feet and saw Nomikonto and the rest of the women of her group lying like so many dolls in the long grass, unconscious. She went from woman to woman and felt their hearts and was thankful to find that they were alive. All those who had followed the eagle were safely back and, to Maneruana's surprise, all of them looked younger than they had been, and they were all endowed with a strange and unearthly beauty.

Maneruana quickly wove a short grass skirt for herself and went in search of those who had followed the bat and the dove. She searched for a long time before she came across an old and incredibly wrinkled woman with a solitary tooth in her mouth, sitting upon a fallen tree and sobbing her heart out. The woman was so old, she seemed like the grandmother of the stars herself. Her thin wasted body was a mass of wrinkles and her hair was as white as snow. Slowly she raised her face and saw Maneruana looking down at her in blank amazement. "Don't you realise who I am, Maneruana? I am Namulembu, who led those who followed the bat . . ."

"Namulembu! It can't be . . .!"

"It is, Oh Maneruana," croaked the old woman. "I don't know how I survived; the rest were consumed in a great fire, together with the great bat we followed. I alone survived in my party—and look at me."

"If this happened to you, cried Maneruana, "what of those who followed the dove?"

There was a sound in the forest behind Maneruana and she spun around. Her eyes widened and she yelled.

There stood Muxakaza and Zuzeni. But if she felt younger, they looked younger. They were nothing but young girls.

All those women who had followed the dove, all fifty of them, had changed from women of forty and thirty summers, to girls ranging from twenty-five to sixteen, and the two youngest were reduced to crawling babies. These two were carried in arm by a buxom twenty-year-old Zuzeni and the half-ripe sixteen-year-old virgin Notemba. Maneruana collapsed and wept.

* * * * *

We were too late, sixteen whole days too late and the white-daubed woman Nomeva, the only one of my zombie messengers who had returned, had confirmed this. Vamba had seized power in Malandela's absence and the Vamangwe were now firmly entrenching themselves as the ruling tribe in the land of the Nguni.

The reason for our lateness was that a malignant fever had broken out amongst the Avengers just after we left my kraal, and we had had to turn back, carrying the sick men on litters. Two of the Avengers had died on the way back and although we had succeeded in curing all the sick, they had still been too weak to walk unaided.

"So the treacherous rat has succeeded in his evil schemes," growled the First Avenger. "But I swear by the Ten Gateways of Creation that the skunk Vamba shall not go unpunished for his evil deed."

"Do not worry yourself about him Avenger," I said. "The moment of glory for an evil man is very short indeed. Vamba will not rule the land of the Nguni for long."

While we were talking, one of my daughters, Luanaledi, crawled into the hut and knelt before me. "I have strange news for your ears, Oh my father," she said.

"What sort of news, child?"

"Very strange news, father," she responded. "While we were out gathering wood in the forest we met about a hundred women and girls, father . . ."

"Women and girls!" I cried. "In this savage wilderness? Why, we are the only people here for many days' journey around."

"It is true, my father, and we have brought all of them back here with us."

"Women! Women!" I cried. "I am tired of hearing about women. Quick, stew up some of them. I'll have them for supper."

"Father, they say they are . . ."

"They say they are all ready for the pot, do they?" I shouted. "Well, dress some of them to start with . . ."

"I beg you to hear first what these women have to say. It is the most fantastic story you have ever heard."

"Well, bring them all into the Great Hut and let me hear their story. It had better be good or I shall stew them so fast. Who are they, did you say, and from where do they hail?"

"They claim they are the wives of Malandela, my father, but we cannot believe it. Why, some of them are nothing but girls, about sixteen . . ."

"I sense great evil behind this. Bring them into the Great Hut, my daughters, and you, Honourable Avenger Leader, stay to hear this strange story."

As Luanaledi led me into the Great Hut I sensed their strange story even before the women, who seemed to be their leader, opened her mouth to speak. We listened to the strange tale unfolding from the lips of Maneruana. We listened until it was well past midnight. And then, finally, I heard Maneruana give a low exclamation of surprise and ask the woman next to her: "But what happened to Muxakaza?"

"I thought she was here," replied the woman. "She was with us in the other hut just before sunset. I saw her conversing with the one-hand deaf-mute in sign language."

It was my adopted son Mukombe who supplied us with the next shock when we began making inquiries in the kraal: "I was sitting in my hut, Great Father, and the door was open. I saw the two women slip out of the kraal gate in the most stealthy manner. One was Luojoyo, Vamba's mother, and the other was that strange pink-skinned and white-haired woman who came with these other strangers."

"When was this, Mukombe?" I asked.

"Just when it was beginning to get dark, my Great Father."

"Now why did that woman take Vamba's mother away?" demanded the Avenger Leader.

"I do not know yet, Avenger," I said, "but we shall know in a few days' time."

Lulama-Maneruana threw herself at my feet. "My lord, that woman is evil—she is possessed by an evil spirit. Please find her before it is too late and kill her before she does more harm than Vamba ever did!"

"We shall go after her early tomorrow morning. Meanwhile I want all of you to go to sleep, because tomorrow we are leaving this place and I am going straight to Malandela's kraal to unseat that evil dog Vamba from his stolen throne."

Bekizwe, Malandela's own brother, was a little man with a very big head who walked with a slight limp and who was harassed by constant attacks of ill-health. Unlike Malandela, who was the most hated chief that ever ruled the Nguni Tribe, Bekizwe was lovingly known by the nickname of Our Little Father by his numerous subjects, and he was a god in the eyes of most. His great mercy and wisdom, and his open-handedness and unselfish love for his people, had won him undying love in the hearts of those whom he led. Not one man and not one woman was there in the land of the Mambo, unwilling to lay down his or her life for Bekizwe. He was a true father to all of them, a father and a mother at the same time. Many are the stories told about Bekizwe, the "Little One", "Our Dear Father", or "Little Black Dove". It was said that he had once disguised himself as a tokoloshe in order to capture a ravaging band of brigands who were making a thorough nuisance of themselves in the north-western corner of the land of the Western Mambo. He had scared the wits out of the band of thieves and had then commanded them to go to his Royal Kraal and give themselves up. When they reached his kraal, with him driving them like so many scared oxen, Bekizwe revealed his true identity—and gave them a free pardon. He chose their leader, Nsongololo (the centipede) as his first Battle Induna.

Another story that is told about him is that he helped a very shy young man to marry the girl he loved, by dressing up as a little girl himself and carrying messages between them. When the heartless girl wove a message mat in which she greatly insulted the young man, concluding by refusing marriage with him, Bekizwe took the mat and, on his way, unravelled it, weaving it again in patterns praising the young man and inviting him to come and claim the girl as his bride. When the girl was confronted with this mat later, she had no alternative but to admit that the mat had come from her and she was prepared to marry the man. For a girl to weave a mat in the patterns of acceptance of a young man and thereafter deny her promise was an offence punishable by the laws of the tribes.

Some time later the Little Chief had summoned the happily married couple and laughingly told them that he was the 'little girl' to whom they had entrusted their messages, one of which he altered. The girl had fainted on the spot, but the husband had laughed and thanked the chief profusely.

These, and many more, were the stories told about Bekizwe throughout the length and breadth of his vast land, stories that were told with loud peals of laughter around village cooking fires to open-mouthed and wide-eyed piccanins. Even while he was still eating the corn off the land, he had already become a legend.

Bekizwe had many children, whom he begot with the ugliest women in the land. This was because Bekizwe's heart inclined to the belief that even ugly people have a part to play in life, and to this belief he clung tenaciously.

Amongst Bekizwe's many children were two boys, Zulu and Qwabe, two very fat and ugly little urchins who were so black that they contrasted sharply against the darkest night. Zulu was one year old and Qwabe three, and both these boys had lost their mother Tandanani who had been bitten by a mamba while out in the forest a year earlier. Tandanani had been Bekizwe's First Wife and he had been mad with grief at her loss, swearing that when the time came for him to take another woman as First Wife, it would be the ugliest woman in the world.

He had spent three whole moons combing the country for the ugliest woman. He had prayed to the Spirits to grant him his wish and had held many Prayer Dances; slaughtered many oxen in tribute to the Spirits of his Ancestors, and then, at last, his wish had been granted.

Nsongololo and a party of warriors had suddenly come upon a strange woman living in a dark cave deep in a dangerous forest and the woman was so incredibly ugly, tall as a man, with the face of an ape. By the gods, was she ugly!

Children ran away screaming when they saw her. Men doubted if she existed at all, or was just a favourite nightmare come to life, and the ugliest women found they had reason to be thankful. These, who were mostly found in Bekizwe's harem, suddenly turned lovely like a midsummer night moon. Everybody soon lovingly nicknamed the monstrous woman Nunu (ugly little monster).

On top of everything she was stupid. She never knew whether she was asleep or awake, alive or dead. She would try to carry water in a grass bucket, and she had to be reminded every morning to put on her skin skirt before leaving the hut.

But Bekizwe was enchanted with his new queen. He was fascinated and enthralled by her. He soon became her slave. At night when the lions roared and the jackals howled in the forest, Bekizwe found his new queen as hot-blooded and passionate as she was both stupid and visually repulsive.

While the people laughed heartily and danced whenever their dear chief's new toy was mentioned, there was one man who strongly suspected that the ugly new queen was something more than just a repulsive idiot giantess. This man was Shondo, Bekizwe's Highest Witchdoctor, who was the most suspicious of men and who was quick to detect that things were not what they seemed to be. Shondo was a great believer in the most ancient saying of the Tribes: "Oh wanderer, lost in the Valley of Life, remember that nothing is ever what it seems to be, and seeing is not always believing!"

To Shondo, Nunu was very much in appearance like a certain goddess of whom the grizzled old witchdoctor had once heard about, as a young trainee, years ago. But what was her name? Old Shondo could not remember.

It was now ten days after Bekizwe had married his new First Queen, and the night preceding the fateful day when so much was to happen in the Royal Kraal—and Bekizwe had a strange, rather frightening dream. He dreamt he stood on the top of a high mountain, looking down at thousands of warriors fighting a fierce battle. Then the mountain shuddered and split from summit to base and he felt himself falling down the yawning cleft. As he fell, he saw his two ostrich feathers fly off his royal headband, floating loosely away from him. He then saw two hands appear from nowhere, catch the feathers and hold them firmly.

This strange and vivid dream greatly aroused Bekizwe's curiosity and he was most desirous to know its meaning. Thus, early that morning he sent for Shondo and with his usual broad smile the Little Chief greeted his High Witchdoctor:

"I see you, Shondo."

"I see you, Little Father. I see you once and I see you ten times. May peace be always your portion in life and may the hyæna of hunger howl far away from your door."

"You are unhappy, Shondo. You look as unhappy as a stolen goat. Tell me, have you eaten?"

"I have not eaten, little Father. I have no desire for food. My heart is black."

"Then you shall daub your heart with white clay here and now, because I am going to send for food and you must eat and drink whether you like it or not. I dislike having to tell my dream to a hungry man whose face looks as sour as last year's corn beer. To me, boy!"

A servant boy entered and the High Chief said: "Bring some cold meat, boy, and bean stew, with a potful of beer for the Old One."

The food was brought and the High Witchdoctor managed to eat somehow, in spite of the dark cloud of strange foreboding that darkened his soul. Old Shondo sensed that something was going to happen that beautiful day. After he had eaten and bowed twice to his beloved chief as a sign of thanks, he listened intently as the Little Chief related his dream. Shondo was horrified at the interpretation the dream suggested to his mind, but he concealed this horror and said simply:

"The dream means that you have a great enemy close at hand, Oh my Little Father."

"But how can anybody hate me, Shondo?" asked the chief. "I have no enemy that I know of, either within or without my country. I have many, very many friends. I think it was just a meaningless dream."

"I wish I could be sure of that, Little Father. But whatever the dream may mean, I want my Chief to know one thing, that no enemy would ever touch you while I live."

"I know that, my loyal Shondo, and I thank you."

As he left his chief's hut, Shondo went past the newly built hut of Nunu and saw the ugly woman feeding the two motherless boys yam stew from a bowl. Then he saw to his surprise that tears were streaming down Nunu's cheeks — and he distinctly heard her say: "Poor little sons. Poor, poor children. But I will save at least you, whatever happens."

The words startled the great witchdoctor and he felt the icy worms of fear crawling up and down his spine. These were not the words of an idiot woman. These words were clearly spoken, not in the usual faltering fashion Nunu always used, but in the clear liquid accents of a sane, normal woman—and above all, a woman who had foreseen what was to happen on that day.

Who or what was Nunu? That she was not what she pretended to be, old Shondo no longer doubted, and he decided to keep an eye on her for at least the whole of that day.

* * * * *

Although the memory of his strange and disturbing dream was strong in his mind, Bekizwe was not the type of man who was easily depressed. He was a strong believer in 'happiness at all times'. So, to amuse his people and children, himself and his wives, Bekizwe donned his newest and most ridiculous headdress—a fantastic towering creation of cowrie shells, ostrich eggs, wooden horns and bundles of feathers of all sorts of birds. He also wrapped himself in his great kaross, which he called the 'kaross of merriment' and which was heavily decorated with such unusual things as stones with holes through them, wild nuts that rattled, dried lizards, two small tortoise shells and about a dozen little monkey skulls.

He strode into the centre of the Great Kraal where women were busy cooking pot herbs in large clay pots. With his head held high and an expression of exaggerated pride on his face, he came strutting like a stumpy little ostrich to where the great pots were boiling, his great kaross sweeping the ground behind him.

"Hey, what is this?" he asked in mock surprise. "What are you women supposed to be cooking here?"

"We are cooking pot herbs, my lord," replied the Second Wife, Kanyisile.

"You are cooking what?" he asked with an exaggerated expression of surprise on his small, round face.

"Pot herbs, lord."

"Pot herbs," whispered Bekizwe. "And why are you cooking this rabbit's food?"

"The children say they are tired of yams, putu and sour milk, so we thought we would have some herbs for the midday meal for a change."

"Do you not know that eating pot herbs gives one a green stomach?" asked Bekizwe severely. "Do you not know that eating pot herbs causes constipation, flatulence indigestion, obesity, running nose, fractured hip bones, stupidity, and a cold in the back passage?"

"But, my lord," protested Kanyisile, "our sacred forefathers showed us that pot herbs were safe to eat and they never suffered any of the ills you mention."

"Our sacred doddering and myopic forefathers showed us that pot herbs were safe to eat, it is true, my beloved stupid, but they were the worst murderers, thieves, wizards, adulterers, fornicators, cheats, cowards, stone heads, malingerers, madmen, blunderers, fools, hypocrites, in short the grandest collection of green bellies under the sun. And do you know why, Kanyisile? Because they ate pot herbs, that is why!"

"But, my lord," protested Kanyisile weakly.

"Do not argue with me! Have you forgotten that I am the High-Low Chief around here? Have you forgotten that I am the chief—the one and only fountain of pure unwisdom?"

"I am not arguing, my lord," said Kanyisile amid shrieks of laughter from the other women. "My lord, dear husband, I did not mean to offend you . . ." she gasped, thoroughly scared by now.

"Kanyisile, you did argue with me and you did offend me and for that I am going to punish you. Go into your hut and remain there until I call you," said Bekizwe in mock anger.

Kanyisile retired to her hut while the Little Chief drew his High Induna Nsongololo aside and whispered into his ear for a long time, concluding with a roguish wink which Nsongololo returned with a smile and another wink just as wicked. He took five young warriors and vanished into the forest.

Bekizwe then called out the drummers and singers and yelled for the cooks to slaughter three cows and prepare, what he called, a small feast for not more than a thousand guests.

A hundred cooks of both sexes sprang into action at Bekizwe's comical commands, and by early afternoon the feast was ready. Great pots full of steaming meat stood in neat rows in the centre of the kraal while piles of huge wooden meat trays were enticingly arranged around the pots. Then, with a great show of dignity, Bekizwe began to inspect the pots of different kinds of meat, cooked to perfection. Behind him came a solemn procession of head cooks, food tasters and other members of the "Stew Regiment", as he lovingly called those of his Indunas who were in charge of food.

Suddenly Bekizwe clutched his forehead and staggered back for a few paces before falling flat on his back. Anxious hands reached out to assist him where he was lying dead still, but he opened one mischievous eye and said: "Oh . . . No!"

"Great Chief," asked Shondo, "is anything the matter?"

"Yes, much is wrong!"

"What is it, Great One?" asked Shondo again, most anxiously

"Just this, Oh Shondo. Am I to eat all this delicious meat by myself? Look at all these juicy roast haunches, these tasty ribs. Am I supposed to drink all that beer by myself? Help! Who's going to help me?"

And with this, Bekizwe leapt up and raced to the gate of the kraal with his kaross lapping up billowing clouds of dust. "Help! Who's going to help me?"

Hearing their chief's voice raised in what sounded like obvious distress, heavily armed men poured out of the surrounding kraals and converged upon the Royal Kraal, ready to die for their beloved Little Father. When the first wave of armed men reached him, he pointed wildly to the inside of the kraal. "Inside, in those pots! Sit down and help me—and help yourselves!"

Men stared in blank amazement at their chief and then at the pots in the centre of the kraal and gradually understanding dawned in the heart of each one of them. The High Chief of Merriment had been full of tricks again. They laid their weapons down—somewhat unsure—and with sheepish expressions on their faces they trooped in dribs and drabs in the direction of the pots, to feast and make merry.

"Oh no! you greedy hogs," cried Bekizwe. "Send home for your wives and tell them to come too. Do you want to get fat while your females grow thin? Have you forgotten that our unholy ancestors have decreed that of the two, the woman must always be the fatter, as she has to take all the weight?"

Roars of laughter greeted the Little Father's last words and messengers ran back to the neighbouring kraals to fetch wives, and even farther afield to other villages, to collect men, women and children to join in the feast. There was eating and drinking, and dancing and singing, and ever so often Bekizwe rose to tell an amusing story which left the crowds breathless with laughter.

Some of the stories Bekizwe told his guests live in the hearts of true Nguni to this very day. Among them are the classic stories of 'How men got their beards', 'The ignorant bridegroom', 'The hot-blooded bride', 'The girl who married a lion by mistake'.

Bekizwe always sat on his famous "Throne of Misrule" on such hilarious occasions. This was a raised platform on four elaborately carved posts, on top of which was a clumsy throne, in the shape of two very ugly women who held up a small stool between them. The throne itself was carved out of one solid piece of ebony.

When the feast was nearing its end, Bekizwe sent for Kanyisile, whom he had promised to punish for arguing with him. He also instructed Nsongololo to bring forth what he had been instructed to prepare in the forest. What they produced was a great skirt made entirely of leaves and long grass, and a large headdress made of cooking herbs. When Kanyisile appeared she was escorted by warriors armed with grass whips, while she was wearing a skirt and a headdress of fibre.

Nsongololo took the part of Royal Accuser and, standing under Bekizwe's tall throne with folded arms, he addressed Kanyisile as follows: "You, Kanyisile, the daughter of Sonsizi, the son of Velapi, the son of Nkomo, have been brought here because you did deliberately and most maliciously argue with the chief, your lord and undisputed husband. We all know that you are guilty and we, therefore, sentence you to do the Dance of Penitence while wearing this skirt of leaves and grass and this headdress of the same pot herbs you had the great impudence to argue over with our most unimpeachable chief."

"My dear people," said Bekizwe in a broken voice. "Before the sentence is carried out on my dear wife, I would like to tell you what we argued about. I found my wives cooking pot herbs—pot herbs, my people—the food of rabbits, oxen and kudu! Oh my people, green herbs that only beggars would eat. Pot herbs which cause people to have malaria in the stomachs, colds in their intestines, green hearts, purple brains and club feet; and which even cause the green grass to grow in people's armpits and sunflowers to bloom in the areas beneath their navels."

Bekizwe paused and wiped away an imaginary tear, while a veritable hurricane of laughter swept the kraal.

"My people, for many years I have been wondering why my wives had a green look about them every morning, and why the babies they present me with always see the light of day with green leaves protruding from their ears. Today I found the reason: my wives are too fond of pot herbs. When I tried to point this out to my wife Kanyisile, she argued with me and said our forefathers ate them and what was good for our forefathers is good enough for their descendants too. My dear wife would not listen and she laughed an argument against me—as long as a crocodile's tail—and I, being as I am a self-respecting.

dignified chief, anxious to avoid a public scene order her to be confined to her hut until further notice."

Kanyisile was made to wear the heavy skirt of grass and leaves, and also the large leafy headdress. At a command from Bekizwe the hands of the masked drummers flew over the taut skins of their drums and Kanyisile began to dance, encouraged by mock blows from the plaited grass whips of her five guards.

Suddenly something fell from her skirt on to the ground and a loud shout burst from the excited spectators when they saw that it was—a fat live hare tied into a furry ball with a strip of calfskin.

"Oh my fathers," cried Bekizwe. "My wife has given birth to a rabbit! This is all the result of eating the food of rabbits. I thought something like this would happen."

"My lord!" cried Kanyisile above roars of laughter from the crowd. "I did not give birth to this . . ."

Her voice turned into a loud scream as she felt something warm and alive struggling feebly amongst the leaves and grass of her large skirt. With a shriek she jumped high into the air and two more rabbits fell out. Then a small tortoise thudded to the ground from her headdress. She tore the headdress and skirt off and ran like the wind to her hut. Amid roars of laughter, Bekizwe collected the tortoise and trussed hares and solemnly gave a humorous name to each creature, calling it his dear child, before ordering some boys to go and release them in the forest. He ordered a 'toast' to be drunk to the latest additions to his family, and the feast ended with another humorous story from Bekizwe, which caused a final roar of laughter. The people departed reluctantly for their homes, but in high spirits, secretly regretting having to leave the kraal of their dear Little Father, and wondering when he would hold another feast.

* * * * *

The sun sank in the West and darkness claimed the land. In the forest, owls hooted loudly and faintly. In the distance, lions roared their challenge to the stars. Bekizwe was sleeping and his dreams were pleasant. Beside him slept Kanyisile whose turn it was to share the Royal Mat. The new First Queen, Nunu, slept in her hut with the motherless boys Zulu and Qwabe.

Towards midnight the chief felt someone shaking him violently: "Wake up, Little Father, wake up!"

The voice belonged to Nsongololo, the First Battle Induna, and former bandit leader.

"Who is stealing the fowls?" joked the Little Chief.

"Little Father," cried the Induna, "wake up and flee. We are being attacked—wake up!"

"Your joke is beautiful, Nsongololo. I will give you a cow in the morning. Now go back and sleep."

"Little Father, I am not joking. The huts are burning outside and people are dying. Our warriors are fighting bravely, but we are badly outnumbered. Malandela, your brother, is attacking us — listen!"

The ringing cry of a dying man tore the night to shreds and dispelled all doubts in Bekizwe's mind regarding the truth of what Nsongololo was saying. Slowly the sounds of a desperate battle crept into Bekizwe's ears.

Bekizwe snatched up his loinskin and put it on quickly. He crawled out of the hut with Nsongololo close behind him. Outside, the battle was in full fury and a rain of spears fell inside the kraal. Ten huts were burning near the first gate, sending billowing columns of red glowing smoke and sparks into the star-bejewelled sky. Dead warriors were lying in the fire-lit clearing in the centre of the kraal and Bekizwe felt his heart sink into the depths of dark sorrow when he came to realise they were his men. He could not believe that the enemy was Malandela — of all people. He wondered why anybody, let alone his own brother, would want to attack him.

Bekizwe looked beyond the forests and saw that other kraals were burning and his eyes filled with tears when he realised that all those kraals belonged to the people with whom he had been fasting and joking, not so very long ago.

Could it be Malandela? They had never had a quarrel; they had lived in peace for so many years. Bekizwe could not believe it.

Even as he watched the brave defenders of the kraal, they were driven back — away from the stockade. A great section of the stockade went down with a loud crash. Warriors swathed in tattered animal skins poured into the kraal. Bekizwe recognised his brother's crack assault regiment—the famous 'Madmen'. At the head of them was Malandela himself.

"Malandela," cried Bekizwe. My brother . . . my own dear brother!"

Bekizwe ran across the clearing, ran towards his brother whom he could see clearly by the light of the burning huts. He was blind to the yelling hordes of Nguni warriors, pouring into the kraal like an overwhelming flood. He did not see his brave warriors fall, selling their lives dearly to Malandela's impis. Only dimly, faintly, did he hear the cries of his wives and children as they were slaughtered by the attacking hordes.

He never saw the huge ape-woman Nunu, his new First Wife, dash out of the kraal into the forest, through a hail of spears, with Zulu and Qwabe under her arms. Bekizwe only saw his brother and he saw the naked fury in his eyes.

"Brother Malandela, what have I done?" cried the Little Chief.

"I see you, wizard," said Malandela between his teeth. "You killed my sons and now you die. Die, you wizard!"

Bekizwe felt pain greater than any pain he had known before—the double pain of Malandela's words and that of the spear which Malandela plunged deep into his side—piercing lungs and heart, and coming out the other side. Bekizwe died not knowing why his brother killed him, died without a chance to plead for himself. Like a light snuffed by a sudden gust of wind, he was cut down by a brother he loved as much as he loved his own people.

He never saw a little woman come racing out of the darkness and throw herself at Malandela's feet. He never heard Malandela's curse and his loud exclamation: "Celiwe! What are you doing here?"

He never heard the hollow-eyed, exhausted little Celiwe shriek loudly: "You killed him! I am too late . . . Oh gods of my fathers! I am too late . . . poor, poor, innocent Bekizwe! You, you . . . Malandela, you foul, stiff-necked gullible fool! You impious, hotheaded, bloodthirsty dog! You killed an innocent man. You call yourself the king of the Nguni, and yet you are a king no more. You think you rule a country and yet that country is now in the hands of others. You have been deceived into killing your own brother and your kingdom has been usurped behind your back. You have been foully deceived, you low-down cur!"

"Celiwe!" roared Malandela. "What are you talking about? Are you mad? What do you mean by saying my country is in the hands of another? Speak, or I shall kill you too!"

"Kill me!" cried Celiwe. "One more murder should not worry your foul soul. You have just killed an innocent man. Carry on, kill more innocent people if you like!"

"Royal One," intervened the old Rainbow Induna Solozi, "I think your most honourable wife brings great and terrible tidings. Please listen to what she has to say."

"Speak clearly and tell me what has happened," said Malandela.

"All your daughters are wives of Vamangwe warriors. Your children and all your wives, save myself, are dead. You will never see your sister Nomikonto again. Vamba Nyaloti, who deceived you into fighting your own brother and who was the one who really killed your sons, is now king of the Nguni and the Vamangwe. You are lost, Malandela, you might as well kill yourself."

"What!" cried Malandela and his Rainbow Induna with one voice.

"Yes," said Celiwe, "and that is not all. I have brought with me the woman Dambisa-Luwewe, who tells me that within one moon the chief known as the Munumutaba of Zima-Mbje will attack our land because of a certain idol that Vamba has in his possession."

"Gods have mercy upon us!" groaned Mapepela, one of the Rainbow Indunas. "What have we done?"

"The gods have no mercy to waste on scum like you," cried Celiwe. "We shall be very fortunate to get out of this land alive. When the Mambo nation learns that their Little Father has been murdered they will come upon us like a landslide down a mountain slope. They will know how to avenge their chief's death—and we have no country to fall back to. What chances have we with an enemy in front of us and an enemy behind our backs, and yet a third on our flank?"

Malandela knew that Celiwe was right. She always was and always would be. He knew that at last the day of reckoning had overtaken him on the wings of sunset. He knew that at last his impulsiveness, cruelty and thoughtlessness had brought him to the very brink of the precipice of undoing, and there was no way out—no escape.

The fact that his throne had been stolen from under him and that he no longer had a country to return to, shattered him completely. Every army depends on a steady flow of reinforcements from the homeland if it is to continue its role of invader in a hostile land, and once that flow of reinforcements is cut off, the army is soon destroyed. With his country in the hands of a usurper, Malandela knew that his regiments, mighty as they were, would soon be overwhelmed by the vengeful Mambo and totally annihilated. He knew that men whose brains are clouded by anxiety for the safety of their families whom they left behind do not make good warriors in a hostile land and he already noticed marked signs of uneasiness amongst his Indunas, nearly all of whom had families in the land Vamba had seized. Conquest of the Western Mambo was no longer possible for Malandela, and he knew it was now utterly impossible for him to try and make peace with the Mambo whose land he had already partly ravaged and whose beloved chief he had cruelly murdered with his own hands. With a low moan of despair, Malandela fell on one knee and touched the cold form that had been Little Bekizwe. Oh, how Malandela wished he could bring the dead one back to life again. How he wished he could raise within the stiff lifeless corpse but the faintest spark of life.

Too late. No amount of sorrow, no amount of tears and no amount of regret could ever bring his younger brother back to life again.

Worst of all, Malandela began to realise that no matter what the outcome of his present predicament, he would carry the guilt of having murdered an innocent man to the day he died. And he knew that men as yet unborn would judge him and find him—a fool.

The stigma of fool is indeed the worst stain that can defile a chief's name and in no time at all Malandela seemed to hear the name of "Malandela the Fool" echoing and re-echoing along the caverns of time.

"Malandela the Fool."

For once in his cruel and wicked life, Malandela felt tears welling into his eyes. He wept bitterly for his dead brother and his family and people, and he wept also for his own murdered wives, family and people. He wept for Nomikonto, his dear sister. These were a great many people to weep for, whose lives he had ruined. And then finally he rose and cursed himself—above all for not heading Nomikonto's warnings. She had always hated and suspected Vamba.

When dawn broke, Malandela ordered that every dead man and woman in Bekizwe's kraal be given an honourable and a hero's burial, with full mourning rites. He ordered all his warriors and Indunas to shave off their beards and hair, and collect all the hair in a great pile in the centre of the burnt kraal. This hair was to line out Bekizwe's grave as a sign of regret and an appeal for forgiveness. Bekizwe was to be buried in his biggest cattle pen, as befitted a chief, and his dead wives and children were to be buried in a great circle around the circular cattle kraal.

Men armed with razor knives went into action just as the sun rose, and by midday every warrior in every regiment had been shaven and the hair collected in a great heap in the centre of the kraal. Warriors carrying hoes and digging sticks began excavating the pits in which the dead were to be buried.

The Little Queen Celiwe and her Baluba companion Dambisa had the agonising task of dressing Bekizwe's dead queens in their best skin skirts and cowrie and copper necklaces, iron and ebony bracelets. Each was buried in a kneeling or crouching position, depending on her age. The mothers were buried in a kneeling position with brooms in their right hands, while girls were buried in a crouching position with water pots in front of them, and gourd water scoops in their right hands. The men and boys were buried with their knees drawn up to their chins and their hands clasped in front of their legs. This required skill and experience, and strength from those handling the already stiff bodies, and it also took a lot of time to prepare each body, with the result that the burial was not completed until the day following. Last to be buried were Bekizwe and his Second Wife Kanyisile.

The First Wife Nunu, with the two boys Zulu and Qwabe, and the Third Wife Nodumo, who was eight moons pregnant, had escaped. Also missing were Shondo and Nsongololo, and the escape of these two men boded ill for Malandela.

Bekizwe was laid to rest seated on his ebony throne with his headdress on his head and his great 'kaross of merriment' covering his shoulders. He was buried holding the short 'Royal Assegai of Justice', with an elaborately carved shaft, in his hands and with his two favourite dogs, Nsini and Hlaya, lying at his feet. They had died while bravely defending Kanyisile and their master's hut.

A great kaross consisting of twelve big impala skin karosses sewn together, was lowered into the circular grave and it completely covered the seated body and enclosed the lining of human hair from the thousands of warriors.

As a hundred chosen warriors filled the pit with earth Malandela knelt nearby. Instead of making a long prayer and speech to his dead brother, as custom required, he simply said in a broken, hollow voice: "Forgive me, brother."

These three simple words were the most sincere Malandela had ever spoken in his life.

Celiwe wailed aloud and clasped her hands behind her head as Kanyisile's body was covered with earth. Loudly she wailed and twice fell fainting to the ground. Tears streamed down her pretty little face which was distorted with grief.

The burials were over and as the old man Solozi dug a hole in the ground near Bekizwe's grave to plant a fleshy leafed mlahla-nkosi plant which must always be planted over the graves of chiefs, the famous 'singing brothers', Ziko and Majozi, began to sing one of their songs, a song destined to live long, and for generations after both brothers had passed to the land of Goqa-Nyawo:

Oh Life, upon whose cruel stream
The Soul of man is borne;
Upon the savage, surging stream—
Behold the Soul forlorn.
As a lost leaf in a flood,
Behold the helpless Soul;
Over the rapids of Despair—
Over the cataracts of Pain
Or through dark forests of Fear,
The moaning Soul is borne.
Ah, cruel heartless soulless thing,
Oh thing as Fate by men misnamed,
We are the playthings in your lap,
The puppets in thy hands.

Behold with pride upon his brow
The scowling tyrant struts,
While 'neath his haughty flaming gaze
The starving peasants cringe.
But all are puppets thine, Oh Fate—
A puppet race, a puppet world;
And every move that each one makes
Is at thy dread command!

Behold with dark and evil soul
The thief a wanderer waylays
And from the wanderer's bleeding form
He rends the copper spoil!
He also is thy plaything Fate,
A plaything in a plaything world;
And though he thinks that I am I,
He is a plaything still!

Behold, upon the field of war,
Two tribes with deathful steel argue,
While loud upon the tortured plain
Resounds the voice of war!
Then he who should have lost the strife
Bears high a victor's shield,
While he who had a claim to Right
Lies slaughtered on the plain.
That was thy dread decision Fate,
Oh strangest Arbiter of all!
And though we shout that We are We,
We are thy puppets still.
Raise not your haughty head too high
Oh tyrant of the vales,
And you who won the glory shield—
Praise not overmuch your strength.

And thief, that stole the bawling calves,
Praise not your cunning hand,
Nor must you boast, Oh proudest headman
Who over thousands rule supreme,
For though you rule ten thousand men,
The Web of Fate rules you.

T'was not thy cunning nor thy stealth
That gained thee calves, Oh thief;
T'was just dread Fate that willed that thou
Shouldst have the bawling things.
T'was not thy war club's mighty blows
That won the tyrant throne for thee;
T'was at Fate's decision sole
That thou didst rule the vale.
Great men, low men, fools and knaves,
Chiefs or peasants, one and all:
Though thou boasteth Thou art Thou,
Thou and all the rest are toys,
Dancing, capering, rising, falling,
In the mighty hands of Fate.

Then when the great singers had finished, the lonely outcast from an outcast tribe, the ebony Baluba maiden, Dambisa-Luwewe, opened her mouth and sang in a low mournful voice:

Bekizwe—Bekizwe—
 Chief of the Mambo Tribe
 Which, at the setting of the sun,
 Still has its fair and ancient land.
Bekizwe—Bekizwe—
 The forests weep for thee;
 The footpaths of thy beauteous land
 Shed dusty tears for thee.

The moon is shamed, the sun is dull,
 The grassy lands are black,
 While bitter in my thirsty mouth
 Is now the river's silt.
 The sakabula sheds its tail—
 The weeping mountains groan—
 The fleet impala sighs with woe
 And hangs his horned head.

The black-eyed cows low woefully
 The stern bulls bellow deep in awe,
 While loud and long and unrestrained
 Each dog lets forth his willing howl.

The breasted virgins laugh no more—
 The warrior's song is stilled,
 While loud and long, with drooping heads,
 The doddering Grey Ones sigh,
 And from each dim and wrinkled eye
 The liquid sorrow pours . . .

For he that laughed but yesterday—
 With his happy tribe—he laughs no more,
 Snuffed is now their Light of Merriment
 It flickers and it burns no more . . .

"Stop that!" roared Malandela. "Stop that, you foreign bitch! Do you want to torture me—have I not suffered enough?"

With a savage oath Malandela threw his spear at Dambisa. But the tall, lithe girl twisted sharply to one side and the missile spent its murderous passion deep in the grass thatch of a hut.

"Madman twice befouled!" cried Celiwe. "Would you add yet another murder to your score? Rabid dog of a Malandela! You, shamed lion with its tail bitten off by a crocodile! Vile warthog without respect for the graves of those you butchered . . . so you will murder still! You, Ngovolo and you, Malangabi, hold that raving madman still, I command you! Break his arms if he resists. Foul, defiled and impotent fratricide!"

The giant hunchback Ngovolo and the powerfully built dwarf Malangabi seized the raging Malandela and held him fast; they no longer had any respect for him, they no longer recognised him as their chief. They despised and scorned the man who had killed his brother without a trial and tried to murder a dirge singer afterwards. In the eyes of his men Malandela was a creature without honour and totally undeserving of any respect. His own wife had publicly called him impotent and that was the worst accusation that can be hurled at any man. It was far worse in Malandela's case, because there it was based on fact!

For a man to start a brawl at a funeral, or to injure or attempt to injure one of the mourners was a heinous crime, punishable by instant death if the offender happens to be a commoner. But for one of Royal Birth, the punishment was worse—ininitely worse than death!

Thus:

"Malandela!" Celiwe's voice was hard and utterly cold. "You have committed a very serious offence. You have shown great disrespect for the dead, which includes your brother whom you murdered. If it is the last thing that I do, I shall see to it that you are suitably punished in strict accordance with the law."

Celiwe turned and coldly addressed the grim-faced Rainbow Indunas: "You know what the law says should be done to a chief who disrespects the dead. Proceed to execute retribution to its fullest extent!"

They took Malandela into the forest, tore off his chief's attire, cut the tree-gum sicolo ring from his head, tore off his 'necklace of honour', and flung all these in the dust. They collected a vast pile of fresh cow dung, goat pellets, dog droppings and any amount of human excreta. All this incredible filth they transported into the forest to a clearing where Mapepela had already erected a giant tripod of tall mopani limbs. From this they suspended Malandela upside down, still fully alive, and he actually stared in utter disbelief at the meticulous preparations that were under way for his formal disgracing.

'This cannot be happening to me,' he thought. 'It must be a bad dream from which I will soon awaken. It cannot be true!' Malandela watched as warriors left the great circle of spectators and fouled the pile of filth that had been brought from the kraal. Many even spat on it to improve the texture. Then Malandela saw the ugly dwarf Malangabi come strutting importantly up to the pile of refuse and scoop some of it up with his bare hands and roll it affectionately into a ball.

"You know, Old Thundering Stomach, I have been wanting to do this to you for years!"

"Malangabi! I command you to stop at once!" croaked the suspended Malandela.

"Why?" asked Malangabi, with a hideous yellow-toothed smile. "Why? You make such a lovely target." And with that he drew back his arm and threw the ball of foul excrement straight at Malandela. It splashed over his face, into his eyes and nostrils. He gasped only to get a second full in the mouth from the hand of the hunchback giant deaf-mute Ngovolo. Malandela retched and vomited as a storm of balls of filth hit him from all directions as each warrior took his turn at defiling and insulting the chief with gusto and many an obscene jeer. In the end the helpless man was one lump of dripping manure, around which thousands of flies buzzed in the midday sun.

Then everyone roared with laughter as Malangabi plaited a long rope of grass and thrust the one end between Malandela's buttocks, saying: "All demons have long tails, whether upside down or right way up!" And with this they left him to his fate.

* * * * *

Just before sunset, the Nguni armies withdrew to their stronghold in the Madlonti mountains whence they had launched their attack on Bekizwe's kraal. Celiwe and the Rainbow Indunas wished to make a stand in the mountains from where they intended negotiating peace terms with the Western Mambo, whom the scouts had reported were massing vast armies in preparation for a fierce counter-attack on the Nguni aggressors.

Night fell. From where he was hanging, Malandela saw a form emerge from behind a bush and make straight for him. It was a tall, lithe dark girl, whom Malandela had tried to kill not so long before—the Baluba girl Dambisa.

"She has come to kill me," thought Malandela. But Dambisa had no such intention. With a few strokes of her knife she freed Malandela and briskly rubbed life back into his numbed ankles and wrists. Silently she led him by the hand through the forest towards the Luangwa River and bathed him thoroughly, not forgetting her own needs. They had not yet spoken a word.

They proceeded along the bank of the river to a fisherman's village that stood deserted. Here the woman collected cooking and eating vessels, two bags of grain and a slab of stone which a fisherman uses as a fireplace in his canoe. She also collected two fishing spears, a shield and an old axe. All these she took to the biggest of the four clumsy dugouts that were moored to a crude jetty. Malandela helped the silent girl to carry some of the things and when the loading was done, Dambisa waved him to step in.

"But why . . . why have you saved me and where are we going?" Malandela asked.

Dambisa made no reply and behaved for all the world as if he did not exist, as if she were entirely on her own, paddling down the mighty Luangwa River.

"Young woman, tell me at least where we are going," said Malandela. But Dambisa remained silent.

The canoe glided down the ageless river, through dark and frowning forests, past the tall rustling rushes and reeds that bordered many an unhealthy malarial swamp. Down the Luangwa River glided the canoe until at last the first light of dawn kissed the eastern skies.

* * * * *

The old witchdoctor Shondo was standing on a rock with Nsongololo, the former thief leader at his side, and both men were looking down at the sea of upturned angry faces belonging to tens of thousands of shocked Western Mambo tribesmen who had just learnt of the murder of their "Little Father."

"I do not believe you," said a burly rascal named Ntombela. "I think you are a liar. Why would Malandela attack and murder his own brother—the brother who is to us as the blood in our veins—part of us?"

"I wish to the gods I were lying," replied the old man, tears flowing down his cheeks. "I have not summoned so many of you here only to tell you lies. Our Little Father and all, except two, of his wives and children are dead in the Royal Kraal. Our warriors, and even the servants, fought to the bitter end in defence of our dear High Chief. But in vain. Malandela was too strong for us. He, yes even he, Malandela, was the one who cold-bloodedly slew his own brother—our Little Chief—on his own doorstep. That foul, defiled murdering cur—he killed our Bekizwe. He killed the Sun of Happiness that shone over our land."

"Tell us that you are joking," said Ntombela. "Surely Bekizwe cannot be dead. No, no, I cannot believe it!"

"It is true, we swear it," cried Nsongololo.

"Then why are we standing here like gossiping old women?" roared Ntombela. "Why are you standing there and whining like a lost dog, Oh Nsongololo? There is nothing we have to live for now. We are like trees with roots cut off. We have lost our father, our very blood. We have lost our head; and without a head, does the body not die? Our lives will never be the same again without Bekizwe, without the smiling Little One we loved so well. What is there left for us but death? Come on, you sons of defiled harlots, come on and let us first take the oath of vengeance. Then let us go and wipe that murdering dog Malandela and his band of cowardly curs off the face of the earth."

"Yebo!" cried Nsongololo. "Men of the Western Mambo, the blood of our dear chief cries out for revenge. His soul is roaming the Grey Land and it will never know peace until its murderer is dead! To enable our beloved chief's soul to find peace in the valleys of the Other World, we must kill Malandela and every Nguni in our country. Do you hear me? Malandela must die! Follow me, everyone."

"Sound the signal drums!" roared Shondo. "Send messages throughout the land. Send messages reading as follows: 'Bekizwe dead. Murdered by Malandela. All Mambo. Able to fight. Assemble. Royal Kraal. Two days. Must Avenge. Our Little Chief'."

From hill to signal hill went the message; from valley to valley, plain to forest. Those who heard the terrible message took out their signal drums and relayed it farther, passing it on to other villages and kraals. A net of sound covered the shocked land. People heard the message and were stunned to the very marrow. Then their shock and surprise quickly gave way to cold anger.

Soon the footpaths leading to the half-burnt Royal Kraal were black with heavily armed bands of warriors keeping the rendezvous with Nsongololo who already had ten thousand men at his command.

Soon the mound of earth under which Bekizwe was buried became red with blood as thousands of warriors cut their hands slightly to let drops of blood fall on their Little Father's grave as they swore to avenge him, no matter what the cost. Some swallowed small pebbles from the grave mound with water as a sign of their dedication to vengeance.

At last all the oath-taking was done and an incredible horde of three hundred thousand men poured in a black flood towards the Madlonti mountains where the Nguni impis were hiding.

The Nguni suddenly found themselves completely surrounded by a sea of angry, bloodthirsty Western Mambo tribesmen and knew that a massacre was inevitable—a massacre in which the Nguni would be the victims. Not one of the Nguni Indunas was unaware that the Mambo were seeking revenge and would show no mercy. They would be satisfied with nothing else but the complete annihilation of that vast Nguni army, down to the very last man.

This is what Celiwe wanted to prevent. She was aware of the importance of peace between the Nguni and the Western Mambo, because these two tribes needed time to prepare themselves to meet the threat from Munumutaba, whose hordes were now reported to be only a moon's journey away from the Zambezi. Munumutaba was reported to have vowed to wipe both the Nguni and the Mambo off the face of the earth in revenge for the theft of his sacred Bronze Idol, and for the murder of his two spies, Luao and Dahodi.

Celiwe therefore sent a message stick to the leader of the Mambo, Nsongololo. It was a beautiful mat on which patterns were woven (see illustration) translatable into the following: "We desire peace with all our souls—the murderer of your chief has been exiled from our tribe."

To this message Nsongololo replied arrogantly: You skulking mountain beasts, we have sworn to kill you all. Come out into the open and fight like men—so say we, you rotten vile cowards."

Celiwe made yet another moving appeal to Nsongololo. She sent a small fibre mat with violet patterns in it (see illustration) decipherable as follows: "Two little birds, one from the East and one from the West, must not quarrel—a hawk from the South is threatening both. It is best for them to stand together."

To this the Mambo replied curtly that battle would commence forthwith. And even as the Nguni received the message the Mambo was swarming up the slopes of their stronghold. Ngovolo, Malangabi and Mapepeia rallied their men, exhorting them to fight and die like men and not let future generations call them cowards.

The well-trained and freshly experienced Nguni regiments fought back fiercely, flinging back one savage attack after another with spears and clubs—and even large boulders. The attacking Mambo were at a disadvantage on the open slopes and died like flies; but for every Mambo warrior that fell, a thousand took his place. The kranzes and the crags shook and trembled with the shock and fury of battle.

"Bekizwe! Bekizwe! Bekizwe!"

* * * * *

The Mambo are still swarming up the slopes like so many monkeys, with shields and spears, and yelling like demons from the sewers of hell. Celiwe's keen eyes can pick out the expression of savage fury and naked hatred on every Mambo face. Their weapons shine dully in the morning sun and their shields fill the mountain slope with colour. Black, red, brown, white, a great kaleidoscope of shields steadily spreading up the mountain side.

Behind their breastwork of stones and boulders wait the grim-faced Nguni regiments, their plumes fluttering and nodding in the mountain breeze. Celiwe crouches lower behind the rock and gives way to tears as Nguni spears take their toll of the advancing Mambo, spears that flicker briefly in the sun before they bury themselves in the bodies of the advancing warriors. Men cry out as they fall, and are quickly lost under the forest of legs. A tall handsome Mambo man gains the Nguni breastwork and two warriors fall under his axe. But lo! a young boy from the Mice Regiment hurls a spear straight and true into his chest and he falls like a tall tree. Celiwe sobs . . . sobs as she realises that perhaps that dying man has wives and children at home. Silently she curses the sheer wastefulness of war.

LET PEACE REIGN SUPREME

PEACE thee, Peace thee, Oh my spirit,
Bow thy head to great Somandla;
Into His hands completely yield thee,
Into His mercy now surrender thee.
Though thou suffereth much disquiet,
The leopard of pain thy heart devoureth,
Though the jackal of sorrow howleth
Within the falling portals of thy soul.

Though raging foemen encircle thee
With whetted steel, vowing thee to slay;
Though scornful laughter pursueth thee,
From hostile mouths deriding thee!
Yield thee, yield thee to the Almighty.
Ere thou wert born He cared for thee;
And when thou diest, He shall be by thee.
Lackest thou then, a protecting hand?
Peace thee, and yield to Him entirely.

Are not the stars of His creating?
Do not the beast proclaim Him Father?
Is He not Ruler of us all?
Is He not Owner of all these?

The River Time supports His canoe,
The fleeting years are slaves of His;
The laughing stars bow low to Him:
Is He not Sire of them all?

Bird, man, beast and tree He owneth;
Star, moon, sun and earth He ruleth:
Who dares to dispute His profound authority?
Peace! And yield completely to Him.
No Evil One there is but fleeth
When Somandla's name is noised;
There is no trouble but that vanisheth,
When thou callest, Him, The Highest!
He shall take thee in His dread arms,
And bear thee to the Vale of Quiet:
Before thy feet and from off thy path
He shall completely sweep all thorns.

Let Him be the Great Helmsman,
 Who guideth thy life's canoe o'er rapids;
 Let Him be thy hard Fire Stone,
 That lighteth thy fire in Life's midwinter.

Peace thee, Peace thee, Oh my spirit!
 Bow thy head before Somandla;
 In life's dark jungle let Him be thy Axe,
 That shall hack thy path for thee.
 In life's chill winter makest Him thy Kaross
 That shall keep cold winds from thee.
 Let Him be thy sturdy Canoe,
 Wherewith thou sailest unto Tomorrow!

The strange song echoed and re-echoed through Malandela's slumbering and troubled brain. Each word, each verse left a firm imprint in his memory. The beautiful flowing liquid tune rose and fell like a river in the canyons of his soul. Over and over again flowed the strange new song, a song destined to live for a thousand years.

It was the famous song which the Nguni, Zulu and Matabele of future ages were to sing in the darkest moments of their land's history. It was the great 'Song of Malandela'—a song that came to him while he slept, a troubled and dishonoured man. He had been deprived of his country by a scheming usurper and had lost not only his honour, but well nigh his life as well; he had lost everything—kingdom, honour, family—and was now sleeping in a small cave in a dark forest with a hard-lipped foreign girl by his side.

Let Him be thy sturdy Canoe
 Wherewith thou sailest unto Tomorrow.

Over and over again, in a great glittering, rotating circle of heavenly melody, the song floated through the dark skies of Malandela's mind. It filled his veins with strength and it lit a roaring fire of hope in his soul. Malandela woke up suddenly, sat up. But the song and its tune was still clear in his mind.

Let Him be thy hard Fire Stone
 To light thy fire in Life's midwinter.

"Am I mad?" muttered the exiled and disgraced chief. "I did not make up a song—it just blossomed in my mind."

"What is it?" asked Dambisa, addressing him for the first time in two whole days.

"I must have been dreaming, Dambisa-Luwewe. I dreamt about a song."

"What song?"

"A strange new song with a beautiful tune. It was simply heavenly," muttered Malandela, holding his forehead in one hand. "I remember every word of it."

"Let us sing it then, my beloved one," said Dambisa. "That song must be a gift to you from the spirits."

"What did you call me?"

"I called you my beloved one," Dambisa replied, "and I love you—I have loved you for a long time. Now that everybody has deserted you and you are alone in the cruel world, I love you even more. I know that, come what may, I will always be by your side."

"My future is dark, Oh Dambisa. We are hiding now in a dark forest in what was once my land. We are hiding like animals and our future is dark. Do you want to couple your life's youthful canoe to my life's sinking one?"

"The spirits tell me this could be the beginning and not the end, Malandela. They tell me this could be the beginning—the re-birth of Malandela, a new, wiser Malandela, purged of the sins of the past. A greater Malandela who will recover his throne and lead the Nguni once more into a glittering future full of happiness."

"I have no such hope in my heart, Oh dear Dambisa. Do not try to light a futile hope within me. What I have lost, I have lost forever."

"Come let us sing the song you dreamt about."

It was already nearing midnight and the moon was high in the night sky. The crickets were harping their love songs under rocks and fallen trees and the owls were hooting derisively from the branches of tall mopanis. In the depth of the scowling forest lions roared savagely and leopards coughed challenges to those who dared to steal their prey.

In a small, cramped and lonely cave high on a rocky hill, an exiled chief sat side by side with a homeless and fatherless Baluba girl, singing a strange haunting song—a song destined to be sung by millions of men as yet unborn, men suffering and dying under stranger chiefs in a future more fantastic than the past had ever been.

Peace thee, Peace thee, Oh my spirit,
Bow thy head before the great Somandla.
In life's dark jungles, let Him be thy Axe,
That shall hack thy path for thee.
In life's chill winter, let Him be thy Kaross,
That shall keep cold wind from thee . . .

* * * * *

We were only one day's journey from the kraal in which the usurper Vamba ruled the land, which he and his gang of Vamangwe cut-throats had stolen from Malandela. Soon, oh so soon I would unseat that murdering Vamangwe devil and destroy him utterly and finally. As I lay tossing and sleepless on my sleeping kaross within the shelter we had erected for the night deep in an ugly forest infested with marauding beasts, I went over in my mind what I intended doing with Vamba. When I caught him, I intended making an umkovu out of him. This is done by cutting off the tip of the tongue and driving a thin steel spike carefully into the top of the skull, some short distance into the brain. This blots out all memory and an umkovu is thus a voiceless, memoryless, half-dead thing that lives on a diet of fermented millet and which wizards send into the kraals of their victims to kidnap people in their sleep or to drive poisoned awls into their ears and so kill them. An umkovu obeys anything you tell it to do—except crossing a river; for it develops an uncanny fear for water.

As I lay thinking and laughing to myself, I heard people singing far away in the distance. They were singing a strange and beautiful song, a haunting song, in the middle of the night. Who were they? What lonely castaways were they, and whence? I used my telepathic powers to catch the words of that fairy melody, that strange haunting song that made me feel like trading my immortality for earthly things, so that I could drop my age-old head and die. Yes, I wished to die and forever shut out this cruel and heartless world which only knew suffering of humans and beasts alike. I, the Lost Immortal, the Outcast of the Ages, hated by the gods and feared by men, leading a lonely unhappy life amongst stupid, selfish, bloodthirsty, quarrelsome, wretched mortals—who are, after all, only good for stewing.

Let Him be thy great Helmsman
Who guideth thy life's canoe o'er rapids.
Let Him be thy hard Fire Stone
That lighteth thy fire in Life's midwinter.

Oh poor human beings, poor pathetic hopeful mortals! Poor self-deluding and ignorant mortals! If only they knew how little the gods whom they seek as Life's Helmsman, could care about the Universe, about the creatures He created.

Being immortal is not a good thing because one has to live for thousands of years with naked and unpalatable reality as one's companion, while mortals like those midnight singers lived their brief quarrelsome lives along with that greatest deceiver of all: Hope! Hope that in one's hour of peril there is somebody looking after one like a fat old aunt who looks after an orphan boy; hope that in one's life there is a purpose and, that beyond the grave is yet another life. Hope that this evil today might fade and reveal a better tomorrow!

Hope, the Great Deceiver, which lying priests and deceitful witchdoctors use as a pedestal for their countless doctrines and beliefs. And yet, strangely enough, I would rather be a mortal, leading a brief, hope-filled life, than an immortal enjoying a life as bleak as the wastelands of the Ka-Lahari. Slowly I got to my feet and groped for my loinskin, and my heavy and ornately carved ebony staff.

I crawled stealthily out of the crude hut, taking care not to awake the three infernal little pests I had the misfortune to call my daughters. I just did not, and still do not even today, know what to do with Luanaledi, Mvurayakucha and Mbaliyamswira—especially the first two. These voodoo girls, who are as ageless and as immortal as myself, were a plague—a High Curse on my shoulders. This evil spawn of both Ninavanhu-Ma and Watamaraka was the ruin of my life. They had the horrible habit of murdering any mortal woman who loved me and whom I wanted to marry. They had already killed five women whom I loved, simply because they themselves entertain an unnatural love for me, their own father, in their evil little hearts.

How I loathe and detest my daughters! I had once even tried to destroy the elder two but I had failed, because they were part of me. They were dedicated to spoiling everything I did, which they thought might turn my attention away from them. They had threatened to kill the Princess Nomikonto recently because she had kissed me in a fit of passion. Was there ever a man so cursed with a brood of foul little demon daughters?

I went outside and made my way past the big temporary huts that housed the Avengers, Malandela's changed wives and sister, and my puppet women who had formerly been the wives of the man called Madondo. Mukombe, my adopted son, must have seen me pass his tiny shelter because I felt his hand on my arm and, although I could not see him, I could see his soul and the anxiety and the love in his heart as he whispered: "Great Father, where are you going?"

"Shhhh," I whispered. "I am going to the forest, son, to find the people I heard singing. Come with me and we shall find them together."

"Let me get my weapons first, Great Father," said the boy, adoration shining in his soul like a sun. As I stood waiting for him to return, I heard once again the distant singing. I smiled as I imagined their surprise when I walked into wherever they were and asked them the reason for their midnight singing. People are forbidden by law to sing at midnight and I intended to remind the unknown singers of that fact.

We had not gone far into the forest when I sensed Luanaledi following us quietly. Her thoughts were quite clear: she was thinking I was sneaking off with one of Malandela's many women and she was promising herself she would kill the woman before I could so much as kiss her.

I paused and called out angrily: "Come out from behind that bush, you vile thing—I know you are there!"

She came out of her hiding place and made her way to where I stood with Mukombe at my side, and she said: "Forgive me, father, but there is no reason why you should call me a vile thing in front of this little mortal here."

"This little mortal here has a purer soul than you ever had, Luanaledi," I retorted. "He has not ruined my life in any way and he does not kill the women I love, as you filthy sluts do!"

"Father, listen," said the girl in a voice so cold and so utterly without pity that it chilled my soul to the very core. "We may be vile, we may be evil, or we may be any foul thing under the sun you care to call us. But remember one thing, we did not ask to be born and we cannot help feeling what we feel about you. We are the results of your stupid lusts: we are you! What evil there is in us we inherited from you. If you had been clean and free from evil we would have been clean and free from evil likewise. But we are the products of an evil father who associated with the Spirit of Evil, and an Imperfect Mother. Do dirty pots bring forth clean food? Do not the mortals say that rotten seed beget evil plants?"

I could listen to the tirade no more and walked on with the awful feeling that every word she had uttered had been nothing but the truth. I sensed great puzzlement in the heart of Mukombe who was immediately behind me. The poor innocent, adoring little mortal orphan could not understand what was happening.

The three of us pressed on deeper into the forest and at last we came to the source of the nocturnal singing—a small cave high on a rock-strewn hill.

"I see you, Oh midnight singers," I said, as we stopped just outside their cave. "Have you forgotten the law that says the hour of midnight must be respected? Do you not know that midnight is the hour of silence?"

Two brains, male and female, through which I could see as clearly as through the crystal water of a mountain stream, were clouded with fear, and a gasp escaped from the lips of the female: "Who . . . what are you . . .?"

"I am an old man and my name is Lumukanda. Unlike you, I do not have to ask you who you are. I am blind, but I know your name is Dambisa, and that the fat skunk with you is no other than Malandela, former chief of the Nguni."

"But I have not told you my name; how do you know me?" cried Malandela in blank astonishment.

"Your lips did not speak, but your mind did, and that I can read more clearly than spoken words."

"Are you a demon—a ghost—a tokoloshe?" asked the girl, panting with fright.

"My father is always joking," quietly intervened Luanaledi. "He is the Lost Immortal, and I may as well tell you that he has a strong weakness for human flesh."

"What . . .!" bellowed Malandela, retreating deep into the darkest recess of the cave. "The Lost Undying One?"

"Yebo," I said. "The lost undying one who has found a dying one, Oh Thundering Stomach! I have long since promised myself that on the day I meet you, I shall have a feast. Now come out of there and let us see if you taste as beautifully as you sing."

"No . . . No! Have mercy, please! If you want to eat someone then eat me," cried the girl Dambisa.

"That I shall do in any case." And with these words I stooped into the cave and hauled the girl out into the moonlight. I felt her all over and said with a sigh: "You are too slim and muscular, my girl, so you're not quite fit for the pot. But I sense your fat Malandela would give me heartburn, indigestion and a sore throat—so perhaps I shall spare both of you. Come with me and be my guests. Who knows, I might even consider helping you out of your predicament."

"Let us first hear them sing the song they had been singing, my father—it was such a lovely song."

Their throats were still dry from fright, but the relief my last word had brought induced them to start singing and soon we all joined in. The innocent mortal atmosphere brought tears to my eyes, especially when the voices reached the final verse in perfect harmony:

Let Him be thy sturdy Canoe,
Wherewith thou sailest unto Tomorrow.

"Please sing! Let us all sing this song once again!" I exclaimed.

Our voices rose into the silver night in perfect unison, floating over the brooding forest like incense from an altar. It seemed to me as if the very stars, which I had not seen for ages, bowed from their lofty thrones to listen. It felt as though the forest held its breath.

"Let us go," I said at last. "And, Malandela, I think you and I have a lot to talk about."

On our way back to our improvised camp, I listened as both Malandela and the Baluba girl poured out their stories all too eagerly, like gushing springs of fresh water. On our arrival at camp, I woke up Nomikonto and had her relate to her brother Vamba's treachery and the blood-chilling adventures she and his wives had gone through in the Underworld. Malandela wept when he met the changed, wild-eyed survivors of his once great seraglio.

Nomikonto and Lulama-Maneruana stressed the need for finding Muxakaza immediately before the evil spirit that took possession of her could wreak havoc in the land. "She is evil, Oh Great Lumukanda, very evil. We do not know where she went with Vamba's mother, but you must find her."

"All in good time, Oh my children," I said. "Even an immortal cannot do two things at once and I think we must pack all our things immediately and be on our way. This time we are going into the land of the Western Mambo to avert a massacre. Vamba can wait—his turn will come!"

* * * * *

The Nguni regiments were still holding their stronghold on the Madlonti mountains in spite of repeated and fierce attacks by the Mambo impis. But the end was fast drawing near. The Nguni, who had not slept for four bloody nights and who were cut off from supplies and refreshments, were in the last stages of exhaustion. Their arms were numb and swollen from hurling spears and swinging clubs, axes and mpangas. Many of them were falling easy victims to the fresher Mambo warriors who were continuously relieved from behind.

Celiwe knew that death stood only a few paces away, watching all of them—herself, her Indunas, warriors, and the boys from the Mice Regiment. Food and water were exhausted and some of her men had already died of thirst. Twice during a lull in the fighting Celiwe had sent her 'sacred messengers' to Nsongololo with offers of unconditional surrender. But the Mambo had replied with abusive signs to both requests. Nsongololo and his Mambo warriors wanted to kill them all, to the very last man.

"It won't be long now, Royal One," said the one-eyed dwarf Malangabi to Celiwe, with a hideous smile. "Do not worry, we shall all be nice and dead soon. I am not scared—are you?"

"I am very scared, Malangabi. I am very scared indeed!"

"I wonder what happened to Old Thundering Stomach," said Malangabi musingly. "Somehow I have a feeling we might meet that man again if we live through this."

"Not one of us will live through this, Malangabi," said Celiwe. "I only wish they would give us all a quick death."

The ugly dwarf laughed. "You will be the last one to get a quick death. You know what is done to the women of the defeated enemy. So, don't go hoping for a quick death, little one!"

"They have withdrawn for the present," said Celiwe sadly. "Perhaps they are eating their supper now that the sun has set. But they will be back. Will this never end?"

"It will, do not worry, and we shall all soon be in a better world—as happy as butterflies."

The sun had already set and a great round tired moon was climbing wearily into the skies. Nsongololo was standing alone on the flat-topped rock this night. Shondo had been killed early in the day and Nsongololo was bitterly angry at the death of his friend. With gnashing teeth and frothing mouth, the former bandit leader was telling the thousands of men massed below:

"This is going to be the final assault on those Nguni dogs up there. This time we must overwhelm them and slaughter them to a man. When you go up there, remember what those scum did to our chief and his family. Let us go now and . . . kill them all!"

With bloodcurdling yells, the teeming thousands burst out of the forests in a thundering black flood. They swooped up the Madlonti slopes like a tidal wave.

"Bekizwe! Bekizwe! Kill! Kill!"

With these savage war cries, the Mambo hordes raced up the slopes, brandishing spears, axes, mpangas and clubs, and not one warrior in all those incredible hordes but thirsted for Nguni blood. Not one warrior in that roaring sea of fierce humanity but hungered to slay the Nguni to the very last man. Vengeance is the sweetest and the headiest mead in creation. Drink from the Claypot of Revenge and drink deep! Happy . . . Happy are they who perish while avenging themselves on a hated foe! Happy is the one who will die first.

Thus the flood of humanity raced up the slopes, each man more eager than the other to see who could die first. Such is the law and the belief among all tribes: that the first, second and third to fall in a Battle of Vengeance receive special honours in the Other World. They are elevated to the rank of gods. Men have cheated and murdered, throughout the ages, to advance themselves to the position where they could be first to fall in a Battle of Vengeance.

* * * * *

Nsongololo has made up his mind that with this attack he is going to be the first to die and he is determined to kill any of his warriors who gains on him as he runs. Ntombela is close behind, but he is taking good care not to pass Nsongololo. Puffing and panting behind Ntombela is the fat Mavuso, the Story teller, who has already felled three Mambo warriors contending for third place.

The three men are running well ahead of the main hordes and they are beside themselves with joy. They are going to be the first to die—they are going to be gods!

"Hail to the three of you there. Happy are you — blessed are you who will die first!" shout the warriors from behind.

But, it was not to be. Nobody is destined to die first; nobody is destined to die at all.

Nsongololo sees it first, and stops dead in his tracks. All the Mambo hordes stop. They stop and they stare—up in the sky—a strange premonition. A ball of fire like a shooting star. No, a comet. They all see sights—the weirdest they have ever seen.

They see naked girls, covered in blood, riding human skeletons. They see them riding backwards on beasts like oxen covered with scales. They see human skulls and gory human limbs, and freshly cut-off human heads.

This is seen by Mambo and Nguni alike. They drop their spears and flee—a mighty stampede with Mambo and Nguni running shoulder to shoulder.

A mighty voice brings the terror-stricken mobs to a halt:

"Listen, Oh Mambo; listen, Oh Nguni. You shall forget your hatred for each other instantly; Tomorrow you shall take a High Oath of Peace for a thousand years. I, the Lost Immortal, have spoken."

* * * * *

It is midday and the sun is shining. A few clouds float like lazy flamingoes in the blue skies above. A wind is whispering its love song to the trees and the long grasses rustle as they dance to the tune. In the great gathering of tens of thousands of men, one loud voice is raised in violent protest:

"But this is contrary to the laws of our fathers! We cannot allow this to happen. The High Law states clearly that all aggressors must be wiped out to the last man. We cannot make peace with these Nguni dogs who invaded our country and laid waste part of it before murdering our chief. Do you hear me, blind wizard? There can be no peace between the Mambo and the Nguni!"

I am sitting on a high rock with my three daughters and one adopted son, and I cannot suppress the smiles that have come to my face. That wordy individual named Mavuso does not know it yet, but he is talking himself into the stew pot. Not only is he excessively rude—he is standing between the Mambo and the Nguni and preventing them from reaching agreement. He has been at it from early morning and I have ordered my two zombies, Nomeva and Muwaniwani, to go to our temporary camp and get the biggest cooking pot we have. Mavuso does not know it yet, but he is already in the soup in more senses than one.

Peace is absolutely essential between the Mambo and the Nguni. A nation divided by internal strife cannot survive the onslaught of a powerful invader. Time is running out and it will not be long before Munumutaba's hordes invade. I cannot allow a single garrulous mortal to stand between me and my task of restoring peace to the land. So . . .

"We have brought the pot, Oh lord, and have lit the fires," announces Nomeva. "What are your wishes now?"

Stay and rest here awhile, and you Luanaledi, lead me down to that talkative Mavuso—I have a bone to pick with him!"

I am being led down the great rock and into the vast crowd of men who cringe away as I pass. I cannot see their faces, but their thoughts spell sheer fright. Some are anxious to repeat last night's performance when I announced my presence. I am now focused on Mavuso's soul, and I read every thought as he stands there on his own in the centre of the rapidly enlarging circle. Mavuso's terror is growing as the distance between us decreases. I can see his courage oozing from his soul like sour milk from a cracked calabash.

"Tell me, Mavuso, what were you saying? I could not hear well from up there."

Mavuso swallows hard, and I hear a strange hissing sound as he wets his loinskin.

"I . . . I said it is unlawful. No! No, get away from me . . . go away, you foul wizard. Do not touch me!"

"My son, you have just made the most delicious mistake of your life! You see, I have the nasty habit of devouring my opposition."

I like men who have the courage to voice their opinions. They make such brave stew and such courageous roasts. Mavuso is merrily sizzling away in my big pot. My spectators were not too amused when I seized him, turned him upside down and crushed his skull on a rock . . .

"Is there anyone who still disagrees with my proposal for peace between the Mambo and the Nguni?"

"There is no one, great cannibal wizard. How can men voice their opinions if you cook them?"

"Who are you, little morsel?"

"Celiwe, Great One."

"One of Malandela's wives?"

"Yebo."

"Then I have good news for you. Your husband is alive and well, and you must return to him."

"Never! I will never go back to that selfish monster—not that evil-hearted murdering brute. I live now to try and make my people happier. Malandela never did so—he oppressed them and only lived to gratify his vile appetite. I would rather die than go back to him!"

"Come here, my little one. Come to grandfather and let us discuss this properly."

I see fear in Celiwe's little soul. She tries to escape, but Luanaledi seizes her and brings her to me. I sample her delicious little round body with my hands, and I sense the youthful beauty of her. A strange feeling creeps over me. I want her . . . madly. I want to possess her, with all my heart and soul. This little woman is kindness, wisdom, mercy personified. She would be wasted on that wretched dull-brained thin-blooded mortal Malandela. I can easily take her as wife. But I sense my daughter's thoughts. They know now that I love Celiwe, and plans are taking shape in their minds to kill her.

Celiwe must not die on my account. The two tribes need people like her. She must go back to Malandela and help him to rule wisely and somehow I have to force her to do so . . .

A second cooking pot has already been brought and into this I gently lift Celiwe. "Nomeva, add some water and light the fire." And to Celiwe: "This is your last chance, Oh beautiful one—I command you to return to your husband."

"Never . . . Never!"

"I command you!"

"No."

"If you don't, I shall cook and eat you."

"That does not matter."

"Why?"

"I loathe Malandela."

The water is getting warmer and warmer and Nomeva is stoking the fire briskly. Celiwe refuses to change her mind, so . . . I lift the heavy lid on top.

"Muwaniwani, bring the pot herbs and yams."

The lid flies off the big pot and Celiwe stands upright. "No . . . No! Surely you don't mean it . . . cooking me alive!"

"I am not joking, young woman. Either you go back to Malandela or back down in the pot."

"No, no . . . I mean yes, yes, I shall go back to him," she wails, like a child.

"Muwaniwani, take her to our camp and dress her in full wedding regalia. Present her there to Malandela."

And raising my voice to the crowds around: "Hear me, Oh tribesmen of the Western Mambo. I now claim you as my people. I now declare myself as your new High Chief. I will stand no arguments and I have given you a graphic demonstration of what I do to people who oppose me. I am invincible—I am the Lost Immortal. I promise to rule you wisely. But you must obey my every command. My first command is, make peace with the Nguni here and now!"

* * * * *

Five hundred skilled wood carvers from both the Nguni and the Mambo tribes went into action. Seasoned mngongo, mvongoti and chiwande trees were quickly felled and split in two from top to bottom after the leaves and branches had been hacked off. Five hundred big Peace Bowls must be ready within two days. These double bowls are to be used in the great ceremony of the High Oath of Peace for a thousand years, between the Nguni and the Western Mambo. Each one must be carved to perfection and lavishly and skillfully decorated.

It is indeed strange to see men who were at each other's throats only yesterday, working together so feverishly. It is a rare and beautiful scene which I had seen only twice before in the many years of my life.

There is the tap, tap, tap of tempered steel adzes cutting into wood. Laughter and boasting jokes . . . and the work is going faster and smoother than I thought it would. One bowl is finished, a second, a fourth, a tenth. Two men from each tribe carve one double bowl and a third smoothens it with a razor-sharp knife while a fourth heats the iron needles used in decorating it.

Meanwhile two thousand Mambo women and youths are building my great new kraal, the kraal I have decided to call Tulisizwe (bring peace to the land).

I want this kraal to be big enough to contain one hundred thousand people and I want it to be surrounded by a quadruple stockade bristling with sharp stakes and metal barbs. On top of that I am going to surround it with a double circle of deep ditches with metal-tipped stakes and also with a double circle of pitfalls and man traps sown with cruel stakes. I am doing all this because I can foresee a great war in the near future and I want to turn my kraal and all others in the neighbourhood into the most unassailable forts on earth.

Now I am busy re-forming the disorderly hordes of the Mambo into disciplined, hard-hitting regiments of five thousand men each. Each regiment is divided into two mabutos of two thousand five hundred men each, and the supreme commander of the regiment is called Induna Yo Tingo, or Rainbow Induna. Under the Rainbow Induna are two Battle Indunas, or Thunderbolt Indunas, each commanding the two thousand five hundred strong butos. Each buto is divided in turn into four parts of six hundred and twenty-five men under the command of a Battle Leader. When a command comes from the chief, it is received by the Rainbow Induna, who passes it to his two Thunderbolt Indunas, each of whom passes it on to the four Battle Leaders under him.

Should a Rainbow Induna be killed in battle, he is promptly succeeded by the two Thunderbolt Indunas who take joint command of the regiment. Should one or both Thunderbolts be killed or wounded, that regiment is withdrawn and reorganised behind the fighting lines.

There are also men known as Battle Avengers, a thousand to every regiment, whose duty it is to execute deserters on the spot and to catch and torture cowards. The penalty for cowardice is to have the 'members of manhood' chopped off and a wooden plug forcibly driven up the back passage.

A collection of four regiments is called an impi (army), and to each impi are always attached two or three Boys' Supply regiments and one Sekela (support and replacement regiment).

I have four regiments in my impi now, and the first is the Swallow Regiment under Nsongololo. This regiment wears headdresses of black sable antelope skin and the shields are black and white, and shaped like swallowtails. The second is the Storm Cloud Regiment under the fat Ntombela. Its members carry oblong heavy dark-red shields reinforced with wood and they are designed to spearhead any attack. The warriors carry five hurling spears each, and one heavy battle axe. Their headdresses are made of red-dyed ostrich plumes.

The third regiment under the command of Dudula, a heavily scarred one-eared veteran who has only half a nose, is called the Thunder Hawks. Dudula fought under Mitiyonke, father of Malandela and Bekizwe. The shields in this regiment are of untrimmed bull's hide, heavily reinforced with crocodile skin. The warriors wear a headdress of ornately carved wood with a cluster of hawk feathers on top. Each headdress is carved to represent a hawk's head.

The last regiment is called the Crocodiles, and each warrior is an expert swimmer, including the Rainbow Induna. I have designed this regiment for secret attack: they will fight on land as well as on water. This regiment is going to man the huge fortified battle rafts I intend to build on the Zambezi. Their duty will be to ferry troops across the river and to attack any enemy canoes trying to cross the river.

Under the command of the former fisherman Mavimbela, the Crocodiles are distinguished by their crocodile skin cuirasses and headdresses made out of the heads of crocodiles.

I also intend forming a fifth regiment of archers and slingers, to be called the Hornets. I want each one of these archers and slingers to be so well trained that he can put an arrow through a man's head at a hundred paces or sling a stone and hit a running guinea fowl at half-a-hundred paces. I know that if the Munumutaba attacks, much might depend on these archers and slingers.

* * * * *

Five days later. Everything was ready for the great Ceremony of Peace. Thousands of willing Mambo tribesmen had worked feverishly to finish the Great Kraal. Two thousand and ten men had been erecting the stockades, digging ditches and mantraps and carving huge wooden gates. More than ten thousand men and women had been occupied building huts at the fantastic rate of five hundred huts a day. My Great Hut, a gigantic monster of wood and grass which could easily accommodate a hundred men, was built over an underground 'secret dwelling' or 'boar's lair', as I had called it. It had been dug and tunnelled out of the hard clay by men whom I afterwards swore to secrecy. I did not want anyone, including the pests I call my daughters, to know what was going on and to have knowledge of my secret underground sanctuary.

Everything was ready for the great Ceremony and scores of oxen were being slaughtered for the feast. Women and girls were bringing in hundreds of claypots full of corn beer and thick-walled baked-clay cooking pots. Great cooking fires were lit; the cooking pots filled with water and the frying pots filled with fat.

It was not long before rows of boys started bringing along the fresh meat from the slaughter kraals on huge six-legged meat trays to the places of cooking.

From all over the vast land of the Mambo, gifts of thousands of cattle and goats were pouring into my new kraal—gifts for the 'Wizard Chief', as everyone began to call me.

It seemed that every kraal and village in the land was anxious to curry the favour of the feared and distrusted new chief, who had the nasty habit of eating people for breakfast if they so much as tried to criticise him.

The traditional gifts of girls were not forthcoming, however, because few parents relished the idea of sending their daughters as gifts to a wizard and a chief who might put them in the stewing pot rather than taking them to the love mat, as all good chiefs should.

Thus I was beginning to feel very lonely indeed. In fact, I was going to be the loneliest chief on earth, because my subjects treated me as one treats an evil and dangerous animal.

Whenever I summoned some of them to my presence, they came with shuffling steps and fear written all over their souls, and they were all too keen to get away from wherever I happened to be. Even my newly elected Rainbow Indunas spoke to me from a very safe distance of ten paces, crouching like runners about to take off. I did not like this at all, but there was nothing I could do to prevent it.

The cooking and the roasting had gone on right through the night and early on the following morning there remained only the final preparations before the Ceremony of Peace began.

The Laws of the Tribes require that if people intend to do something of importance, time should be taken to do that something properly and it was the deepest sacrilege for anyone to try rushing the preparations for something as important, as great and as sacred, as a Ceremony of Peace.

But now, everything was ready. The sun smiled from a cloudless sky and the birds sang their joy in the trees. The grass, already yellowing with the approach of autumn, or 'Late Summer' as the tribes call it, nodded and rustled to the faintest breeze.

Four powerful Nguni and four powerful Mambo warriors carried a great slab of sandstone into the kraal—the 'Peace Stone'—with a shallow scoop out of the centre. This stone was hollowed out by craftsmen who also decorated it with signs and inscriptions decipherable as follows:

"On top of me (over this stone) the two Tribes, Nguni and Western Mambo, made peace. Do not dig me up. Future generations respect this peace. All our evils of yesterday are here buried for a thousand years."

The Peace Stone was carefully laid on two great karosses and the skilfully carved wooden peace bowls were arranged in a wide circle around the stone.

The ceremony begins—the ceremony on which so much depends for so many generations to come. Thousands of people converge on the great kraal and the hills overlooking Tulisizwe are black with distant spectators from the farthest corners of the Mambo land—even from beyond its borders.

News of this rare event has travelled like wildfire over the lands of many tribes. A Peace Ceremony! A rare thing that happens once every five hundred years.

Oh sacred, unforgettable ceremony, that means so much to so many! A ceremony that means that men need go about no more with fear in their hearts — that means that men no more need take the whetted steel to fellow men. The weary wanderer shall no more be greeted by burning kraals and dead bodies in the valleys. In this land, at least, the war spear is broken and the voice of war shall shatter the peaceful night no longer.

The massed Nguni regiments face their former enemies across the Stone of Peace, but there is a green branch of ntolwana, instead of a spear, in the hand of every warrior. The frowning war headdresses have been laid aside, as have been all other war regalia, including shields. From the Nguni side, the Rainbow

Induna Mapepela steps forward with a battle assegai in his hands. From the Mambo side, Nsongololo steps forward. But he is carrying nothing in his hands. Then the Nguni singers Ziko and Majozi, start up the Song of Peace:

Now lo, the weary impis
 Lay down their bloody spears,
 And from war's night they turn away
 To seek the dawn of peace.
 Souls by hatred scorched, they seek Refuge now from hatred's flame;
 War-weary warriors come to seek
 The fair embrace of Peace.
 Let us come together friends
 And build from war's destruction Love;
 Those who carry hatred still today—
 Let them do so never more.
 The summer of peace has arrived,
 War's dark winter has fled
 And never more shall there be heard
 Amongst us, the Song of War.
 The dark deeds of yesterday,
 My brothers, let's bury them now;
 Let us now as brothers wait
 For tomorrow's peaceful dawn.

Mapepela slowly stretches out his arms and offers the spear to Nsongololo, shaft end first. Nsongololo takes it and breaks it over his knee and throws the two halves contemptuously to the ground.

He extends his right hand and shakes hands with Mapepela, who leans over the Stone of Peace and kisses Nsongololo's forehead briefly. Both men stretch out their arms and touch one another's shoulders before changing places. Mapepela returns to stand in front of the Mambo and Nsongololo returns to the ranks of the Nguni.

"I see you, Oh brother," says Mapepela to Nsongololo. "May, as of now, the cloud of war vanish between you and me forever. May there no longer be strife of any sort between us. May peace be the torch to light us both on our way and may the deeds of the past, though impossible to forget, be remembered without rancour. May, on the refuse that is the past with all its mistakes, the plant of a peaceful and enlightened future grow. May we, on the cinders of the past, build a new kraal of understanding, love and brotherhood between our two tribes—a kraal that will stand for a thousand years as an example to future generations."

"I see you brother, and I see you again," Nsongololo now replies. "My eyes look upon you in peace and my heart is white when I see you. Both you and I can now face the future without having the gritty dust of hatred blinding our eyes. We can now face the future without the wood smoke of enmity itching our eyes. We can now swim across the River of Life unhampered by the grindstones of war tied around our necks. I see you, Oh brother, and I see you again and yet again. As from now, when you come into my kraal, I shall give you water to wash your hands and food to still your hunger. My daughter shall lay a sleeping mat for you and you shall spend the night in my kraal without fear. Brother, I see you and I see you in peace. Between us the tool of war has been broken and there is peace between us. Our tribes shall stand together and face the future side by side."

Two old Tribal Avengers hand out small knives to the warriors, one to every tenth man, and with these knives the Nguni and the Mambo warriors each make incisions between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, and they all let some blood drip into the Bowl of Peace nearest to them. There is one double Peace Bowl to every one hundred warriors—fifty Mambo and fifty Nguni. When the bowls are half-full, the two old Avengers go from bowl to bowl pouring bitter joye juice into the blood to prevent it from coagulating.

When all this is done, the Avengers call upon the Great Spirit and the Holy Ancestors of both tribes, to witness the Vow of Peace which the Nguni and the Mambo now make to each other. The Rainbow Indunas take all bowls and empty them into the great hollow in the Stone of Peace.

At the command of the Avengers, the warriors, both Nguni and Mambo, queue up in one long line and march past the great Stone of Peace. As each warrior and Induna passes, he dips his forefinger of his right hand into the blood and then puts that finger into his mouth after which he says aloud: "I am one with my brothers and they are one with me. Whoever attacks the Mambo now attacks the Nguni. Where there was war, there is now peace; and where there was disunity, there is now unity."

There is a continuous drone of voices for a long time as warrior after warrior repeats the words—words which one must speak with all sincerity straight from the heart, because the spirits must see the genuineness of the desire for peace in the hearts of all the members of the two former enemies.

By midday the solemn ceremony is over, but one more ritual remains to be done. The Little Queen Celiwe, whom the Nguni warriors have chosen as their chieftainess, with Malandela demoted to Prince Consort, steps up to the Stone of Peace with a ceremonial water pot on one shoulder. A woman named Nonuda, representing the Mambo tribe, also carrying a claypot full of water, approaches from the opposite direction and, like Celiwe, puts her pot down on the Stone of Peace. A young girl brings a gourd water scoop to the two women.

Celiwe takes the vessel and scoops out some water and hands it to Nonudu who drinks the water and, with the same scoop, hands Celiwe some water from her pot. Then they both wash one another's hands upon the Stone of Peace, before leaping on to the stone itself and falling into one another's arms in a fierce embrace.

With shattering abruptness the drums crash out a booming torrent of savage noise; the fierce sinuous Dance of Life begins—the Dance of Life which seals the Peace Ceremony.

From behind a tall grass fence there emerges a weird figure: a man dressed up as the Holy Tree of Life, with little carved figurines of men, birds and animals dangling from every branch of his wood and bark costume. My eldest daughter Luanaledi, bursts through the crowd daubed from head to foot in white clay, representing the First Goddess Ninavanhu-Ma. Leaping, shaking, swaying, and all but tying herself in knots, she dances around the Tree of Life while the storm of drumbeats mounts to a deafening crescendo. Slowly and menacingly the Tree of Life approaches her while she dances. But like a lithe phantom, she leaps away from her would-be captor and dances in dizzy circles around him. Then, from one of his many branches, the man representing the Tree of Life plucks a soft sphere woven out of bark and hurls it accurately at the dancing girl, enacting that incident so long ago when the Tree of Life threw the moon at the First Goddess.

The drums roar out as the Tree seizes the make-believe Goddess and pretends intimacy with her. Rattling nuts are shaken and everybody dances as my daughter, in the role of the Goddess, writhes and screams on the ground in pretended labour, symbolising the lengthy agony the Goddess suffered before she gave birth to the First People.

The first dance is over and everyone takes refreshments. Huge trays full of well-stewed and well-roasted meat are attacked with savage gusto. Giant claypots full of beer are emptied of their contents in the twinkling of an eye. Roars of laughter fill the air with an earth-shaking din.

Outside the kraal, lively contests are held by boys—running, wrestling and stick fighting—contests in which the victors win either one or both the lungs of an ox, roasted or boiled to perfection. My son by adoption, Mukombe, has won a delicious boiled lung in a stick fight.

The great feast, with close to ten thousand people participating, not counting the two armies, is by no means a disorganised affair. Under the gaiety, the singing, shouting and laughter, stern rules of feasting are being strictly adhered to. For example, each kind of meat is eaten only by that age group supposed to partake of it. The warriors eat what is known as the 'warriors' meat'—that is, the flesh from the heads and hooves of the oxen and also the tails and the intestines which have been stuffed into the stomach bag together with fat from the kidneys, before being boiled. The Rainbow Indunas, Thunderbolts and Battle Leaders eat only the liver and the kidneys and the left haunches, while old men, regardless of rank and social status, eat what is called the 'meat of the Grey Ones'—that is, the tongues and the right haunches.

All strangers are given meat from the forequarters, while all beggars are given what is called 'beggars meat'—that is, the back passages and the genitals.

Married women eat only the very fat meat from the breast bone, while virgins eat the udders of cows, slaughtered expressly for this purpose.

Adolescents of both sexes eat the brains and the left-overs from any of the other age groups.

Newly married brides are not given any meat; the law forbids it. They must be content with soup, yam stew and corn cakes.

All men born out of wedlock, all impotent men who have no wives, and all liars and cowards, have been separated from the rest of the people and are shut inside a dark hut guarded by two burly warriors. They eat the 'meat of shame'—that is, the urine bladders, and goat's meat mixed with a little earth.

Suddenly there are hoots of laughter as Mboza, one of the male cooks, who has been caught eating the meat of the Rainbow Indunas, is brought forward for punishment. A cracked old clay pot is fitted over his head and he is made to wear a heavy necklace of the jawbones of goats and oxen, while his stomach is smeared with black soot from the bottom of cooking pots. His loinskin is torn off and a witchdoctor paints the following signs on his bare buttocks in white clay: "I AM A THIEF."

The laughter reaches hysterical proportions as Mboza, the best cook in the whole land, is made to run the gauntlet of warriors who each gives him a heavy kick as he passes. Mboza ends up by running blindly into the closed gate, which he hits head on, shattering the pot on his head and falling heavily on his fat buttocks. He is not seriously hurt, however, and his fellow cooks carry him to his hut with many a ribald 'cook-place' joke.

The eating and drinking and singing is over and people wait tensely for what is to follow. They do not have long to wait. A horn bugle sounds and a great monstrosity of wood and skin and clay enters the main gate of the kraal. This monstrosity is a great fish, hideous, with a mouth full of wooden teeth and a body of cow skin, wooden fins and tail, and painted all over with fertility symbols. Its eyes, skilfully painted in white, yellow and black, glare menacingly at the people. This fish is supported by fifty warriors dressed in grass, tree leaves and fibre from head to foot, and a red-daubed girl rides on top. With her is an ugly man, the dwarf Malangabi, the Nguni Rainbow Induna. The girl is Ntombazi, the Mambo girl who has for a strange and very interesting reason fallen madly in love with Malangabi.

The fish represents that great 'Fish of the Seas' on whose back the Father and Mother of the Second People, Odu and Amarava, escaped when the empire of the red-skinned First People was destroyed. Malangabi represents Odu while his adoring sweetheart represents Amarava, whose name was afterwards corrupted to Mameravi—Mother of Nations—by the Sacred Storytellers.

Reed flutes shriek out and xylophones rattle as everybody—man, woman and child—rises and begins to dance.

The second part of the 'Dance of Life' has begun.

Soft-eyed virgins abandon their shyness and turn into ravening bolts of dark-brown, passion-charged lightning and they leap, shake, sway and even turn complete somersaults to the music of flutes, pipes, and marimba xylophones. Old men and women forget their age as the wild 'Song of Fertility' rises to a savage crescendo. They forget their toothless mouths, wrinkled faces and bodies. They forget their age-stiffened joints, age-cooled veins and weakened muscles. They yell at the tops of their voices and stamp their thin, wasted feet. They are slow and clumsy and many are not even in step, but they do not care. Any step, as long as it is a dancing step, caper or gallop, will do.

If only I still had my sight to see this marvellous spectacle . . . If only I could see . . .

The married man dances with his wife, or wives; lover with lover; unmarried girls dance in 'regiments' on their own, openly flirting with and teasing the hot-blooded warriors dancing opposite them.

With a nerve-jarring suddenness the growling drums boom out, adding more sound to the incredible barrage of noise. The dancing reaches heights of wild abandon, terrible to behold. Savagely dancing girls and screaming women tear into the ranks of the maddened warriors—twisting, shaking, leaping and bending. Two of the men are sent spinning by women who strike them in the groin with their broad hips. Here and there a girl is tossed into the air and expertly caught by strong arms as she comes down. An exhausted married woman is carried away by her husband amid shouts of laughter and crude banter.

Malandela carries his tiny Queen Celiwe on one wide shoulder out of the jostling crowd which is now fast losing control as people dance around the great monstrous fish with its bearers and riders. The Princess Nomikonto is dancing with her new lover, the singer Ziko. Lulama-Maneruana and the rest of Malandela's changed wives, whom he refuses to take back and who are all mine now, are also among the crowds and all but dancing themselves into a frenzy. The only people who are not dancing are my three puppet women who are serving me with food and beer, here where I sit—an island of unhappiness in a seething ocean of joy and wild abandon. Beside me sit five of the masked Avengers, including the Avenger Leader. Strict custom forbids Avengers from taking part in any dance, singing or burial, unless it is the burial of an executed person.

The dance is now at its wildest and the venerable old man, the sage Mpungoso, the Master of Ceremony of the Feast of Peace, makes his way to the drummers and raises his long black Stick of Wisdom. The beat of the drums slowly dies away. The dancing and singing now also dies down and people sort themselves out and seat themselves with many a weary sigh. The great moment has arrived for the burying of the Stone of Peace in the centre of my kraal. Absolute silence is now imperative.

A drunken man and his wife who had trodden on one another's toes during the dancing and who had continued shrieking obscenities at each other, regardless of the order for the Holy Silence, are seized by the Tribal Avengers and taken out of the kraal. They are going to be hung by the wrists from a marula tree and given a hundred lashes each with a rawhide whip.

A heavy thrashing was also to be given, in my Great Hut, after the feast, to a hot-blooded beautiful stranger, the widowed Noliyanda, daughter of Xhosa, a thieving chief who rules a small breakaway tribe of expert cow thieves. They call themselves the Ama-Xhosa, after their chief. This tribe inhabits a small portion of the land of the Mambo, towards the southern tip.* Noliyanda had been given by her father, Xhosa, to Shondo the witchdoctor, as the price of Shondo's services in curing his persistent headaches. Shondo was killed in the battle of the Madlonti mountains and he had only received his golden-brown dark-eyed, full-hipped and full-breasted, though sterile, beauty thirteen months before.

Noliyanda had been caught trying to seduce a young boy of eighteen years to go into the bush with her during the wildest moments of the Dance of Life. This female was notorious for her strange love for boys younger than herself and already the stern Avenger Leader is pressing me to have her whipped to death in public for her offence.

I nod in agreement; even I dare not stand in the way of tribal justice. But I have a strange feeling of sorrow as I agree to this. I wish to spare Noliyanda from such a harsh chastisement. An exciting idea dawns above the valleys of my mind—an idea that banishes the crushing feeling of sorrow and loneliness in my heart and makes me smile broadly and say to the proud Avenger: "Yes, Oh Avenger, the woman shall be whipped to death as the law requires."

I had decided suddenly that I desperately needed a First Queen. I intend stealing Noliyanda and bringing her back to me afterwards, secretly, so that my three daughters will not interfere until it is too late.

*It is this thieving tribe of cunning bush-skulkers which in later years blossomed into the mighty and famous Xhosa nation after the Great Journey to the South.

I have made up my mind that I am going to train Noliyanda into being the most perfect and most powerful being in the Universe—a being against whom my three daughters will be powerless. I need a wife.

The Stone of Peace is lowered into the great hole that has been dug in the centre of my kraal and now comes the most harrowing part of all this strange and uncommon ceremony. Two brave warriors are required now—brave men, one each from the two opposing tribes. A Nguni and a Mambo who must don full battledress and be buried alive in the hole with the Stone of Peace. This is the final tragic seal of peace between the two tribes—the most cruel sacrifice of all.

No word is spoken and people must communicate by signs only. Everyone grows tense and there are tears in the eyes of many. With a whispered curse, the dwarf Malangabi leaves the ranks of the Nguni and stands forward, but Mpungoso thanks him in sign language and waves him back—he is too ugly and deformed.

The two men needed for this final part of the ceremony must be the most handsome, the most brave and the strongest men from either tribe. Tension mounts as a tall, lean hard-lipped Mambo steps forward. A loud cry follows as a Nguni warrior also steps forward.

HIS ADOPTED SONS

“Oh no!”

That agonising cry is wrung from the lips of a round-faced girl somewhere in the vast silent crowd. But the cry is cut short as the girl's mother clamps her hand hard over her offending offspring's mouth.

The hard-eyed tall Mambo has stepped forward. He is Luti, the son of Vezi. But the handsome Nguni is known only as Mdelwa, and he does not tell Mpungoso who his father is.

The Mambo girl who cried out has been Mdelwa's sweetheart for the last few days and she is horrified and brokenhearted when she sees her beloved thus forsake his young life and her.

Two Avengers lead the young men away to be dressed and fully armed. When at last they come out of the huts, striding abreast with heads held high and their weapons and bracelets shining in the sunlight, the young girl, Nozipo, breaks free of her mother's detaining arms and throws herself at Mdelwa's feet. “No, Mdelwa, you cannot do this—not you Mdelwa!”

One of the Avengers seizes the sobbing girl roughly and drags her aside. Mdelwa and Luti help each other into the pit and both squat upon the Stone of Peace, facing each other. With a smile on his cruel, hard features, Luti extends his hand and shakes Mdelwa's hand as the deep pit is filled in rapidly by fifteen Avengers, using hoes and canoe paddles.

Nozipo suddenly goes limp in the Avenger's arms, and when he looks down he finds that she is dead.

She is lowered into the half-filled pit, from the bottom of which at this stage only the headdresses of the two entombed warriors are protruding.

“Tell your children, and urge them to tell their children,” bursts forth the philosopher Mpungoso as he stands over the pit which is now completely filled in and stamped over. “Tell them that in the centre of this kraal built by Lumukanda, King of the Western Mambo, the Peace Stone is buried. Tell them that here the Mambo and the Nguni broke the spear of war and made peace forever. Here we buried the mistakes of our yesterday and two brave young men sacrificed their lives so that you might live in peace together—to the end of time. Disperse now, and go to your homes. Go to your homes carrying with you the memory of what happened here today.

The guests disperse in their thousands, some to their homes, as far as ten days' journey away, and all of them carry with them memories which will always be fresh in their minds to the day they die.

Malandela is weeping bitterly, because only he knows who Mdelwa's father is. Many years ago Malandela had forcibly dishonoured a young girl in a forest and she had conceived and later given birth to a baby boy under heavy guard in one of Malandela's many kraals, where he had kept her for more than a year. The reason why Malandela had kept this girl, Nonsizi, a prisoner was due to her age—a mere child of twenty and thus of the age as yet not permitted by tribal law to sleep with a man, or to be slept with. Malandela who was in those days an insolent and blundering tyrant, had kept the girl a prisoner in order to avoid a scandal and because raping a girl who is under twenty and who has not been initiated into womanhood in accordance with the Laws of the Tribes, promptly invites death for the offender at the hands of the Tribal Avengers. Nonsizi had died mysteriously six months later and the little boy, Mdelwa, whose name means 'Forsaken One,' had been brought up by two old women in the secret kraal. Malandela had never recognised Mdelwa as his son and although Mdelwa had once saved Malandela's life in battle, he had never been promoted or thanked by his father. Mdelwa had known very well who his father was, but had chosen to take this secret to the grave with him.

* * * * *

Although peace has been made between the Mambo and the Nguni, there is still someone in the land of the Mambo whose heart is on fire with revenge and grief. This is the Second Queen of the murdered Mambo Chief Bekizwe, who is dying in her father's kraal far away. She had given birth to a baby girl three days ago and although the baby is alive and well, the mother is dying. Beside her kneels Tembani, her faithful handmaiden, and to this bitter and ill-favoured woman the dying queen says: "Now promise me, Tembani, that you will take my little girl and bring her up as your own child. But remember, when she reaches puberty, you are to tell her exactly who her father was and how he died. You are to make her take an oath that one day she will kill Malandela and thus avenge her father—do you hear me?"

Tembani places her right hand below the navel of the dying queen and solemnly swears to do as bidden. Then, as the woman dies, Tembani whispers in her ear: "Do not worry, Oh my mistress, because even if it takes me a thousand years I shall grant your dying wish. I shall bring up your premature little girl Pindisa (Vengeance) as if she were my own, and when she has grown up—Malandela shall die!"

* * * * *

After the guests had dispersed and the memorable ceremony was over, a company of warriors which had been out patrolling the forest, returned home just before sunset, bringing with them the First Queen of the murdered Mambo Chief. They had caught Nunu in a cave where she was hiding Zulu and Qwabe, Bekizwe's little sons. The Battle Leader commanding the company knelt before me and said:

"We found this woman hiding in the forest with these two children, Oh Great One. They are Bekizwe's two sons and his First Queen, Nunu, this most hideous and ugly female here. What shall we do with them, mighty King?"

"Take them to the women's huts and tell the Royal women to wash and feed them. Then call the Nguni ex-chief Malandela to my presence," I commanded.

A short while later, Malandela, Celiwe, Dambisa-Luwewe and six Nguni Rainbow Indunas entered my Great Hut and I lost no time in telling them about the woman and the little boys who had been found in the forest.

"I have lost all my children, Lumukanda," said Malandela at length. "And since the High Gods in their mercy have spared two of my brother's sons, I shall adopt these boys and make them my sons."

"The adoption will be in strict accordance with High Laws," said Celiwe. "We must make preparations for a Ceremony of Adoption immediately."

"Do the Rainbow Indunas agree to this?" I asked, absent mindedly tapping the huge cooking pot.

"Great One, we give this adoption not only our fullest agreement, but our blessing as well. We consider it to be the best thing that can be done for the departed one, Bekizwe's, memory. It will go down in history as the noblest deed Malandela ever accomplished and it will, in our eyes, salvage for him a little of the respect we lost for him on the day he was disgraced," said Mapepela, the Nguni Rainbow Induna.

"Those are indeed words of wisdom, Mapepela. I wonder what a man as wise and as fat as you will taste like in the shape of stew. Quite noble, I suppose."

Nervous laughter followed this remark and Mapepela suddenly found that his bladder needed relieving. He crawled out of the hut, followed by titters from Celiwe and Dambisa. Shortly after that the Avenger Leader entered and stood before me, his soul radiating insolence and righteous anger. (Avengers never kneel before chiefs and they always address even the highest of High Chiefs in a haughty manner.)

"Chief!" he snapped. "The time has come for the punishing of that unnatural beast named Noliyanda, who tried to seduce a young and uninitiated boy. I demand that all the women in your kraal and all the Rainbow Indunas attend."

"It is fortunate for you that Avengers are such revered people," I told him coldly, "otherwise I would have roasted you so fast for your insolent words, that you would find no time to scream until you were half digested! Bring the woman in and have her whipped to your heart's content. You, Malangabi, go and call the Royal Women and the other Rainbow Indunas."

* * * * *

The great hut was full of people, men and women who had come to witness the punishment of Noliyanda, the Xhosa woman. There were a series of gasps from the women when the beautiful woman was brought in and flung unceremoniously at my feet. I sensed her shrinking, frightened soul clearly. She was so scared that she could not think and her thoughts were a hopeless jumble.

'You do not know it yet, my beautiful one,' I thought to myself, 'but you are not going to rot in a grave of shame. I shall revive you and make you into an undying goddess. You have not come to the end of your life yet; you have, in fact, come to your rebirth.'

The Avenger Leader then spoke and his voice was a harsh rasp in the silent hut: "You, Noliyanda, the only daughter of a thieving bastard named Xhosa who calls himself chief of a dog tribe known as the Ama-Xhosa, are accused of trying to mislead a young and uninitiated boy. Do you deny the charge?"

"Yes," gasped Noliyanda.

"Why?" grated the Avenger.

"I . . . I . . ."

"Be silent!" cried the Avenger Leader. "One of you, bring in that boy."

"I have already brought him in, Oh Great Leader," one of the Avengers replied.

"You, boy, stand up!" roared the Leader. "What is your name; how old do you think you are; who is your father; who was your grandfather; what did this woman say to you and what did you say to her? Answer!"

"I . . . My name is Vumani, Great One," stammered the boy. "I am the son of Ntombela, the Rainbow Induna. My grandfather was Malevu . . ."

"What did this woman say to you? And what did you say to her?"

"It was during the dance, Oh Great One . . . I was also among the dancers. She . . . She . . ."

"She did what? And whom do you mean by 'she'? Don't waste my time boy; speak clearly if you value your wretched life. She did what?"

"She drew me aside and told me to come to the forest with her . . . She said she had something to show me."

"What did you say to her?" And what did you think about what she said? The truth, boy!"

"I asked what it was she wanted to show me and she laughed and said I would see when I got there. I told her that father forbids us to go into the forest on our own and . . ."

"And what?" roared the Leader. "Speak up, you unclean brat!"

"She kissed me in the mouth . . . with her tongue . . ."

"So!" hissed the Leader. "And what did you think of all this?"

The boy did not answer and I, who could see in the depths of his mind, clearly fathomed what he had thought when she had kissed him. He had felt very strange and frightened at the same time—but also very curious, as any boy would be under similar circumstances. I realised that if he admitted this to the Avenger Leader he would be put to death immediately and without mercy. So, to thwart the old Avenger, who was trying to trap the lad into convicting himself, I took command of the boy's mind and replied through his lips:

"I was frightened, Oh Great One . . . very frightened."

"You can sit down now," growled the Leader. "You are a good child."

Noliyanda was tied to one of the solid posts supporting the hut and whipped until she lost consciousness. Then water was thrown over her and when she came back to life she was whipped again, this time until she dropped in a dead faint. I commanded my two strongest zombies to follow the Avengers who were taking Noliyanda's limp body away for burial in the forest.

Outside, the angry skies were being torn by lightning. Earth-shaking peals of thunder exploded again and again above the cringing land. Soon hail and rain would sweep the forest-clad hills, valleys and plains.

No sooner had the Avengers buried the not-quite-dead woman and left, when my two zombies exhumed her and carried her back to the kraal, which they entered through a secret tunnel known to me and them alone. Under cover of the roaring darkness, Noliyanda was brought into my dark and empty Great Hut, and lowered carefully into the secret underground dwelling place. Nomeva then securely fastened the wickerwork door of the hut and joined Muwaniwani and myself in the secret dwelling.

My two zombies carefully washed the half-dead woman with hot water and laid her very carefully on a big rush mat. Then I ordered Muwaniwani to cut the woman's scalp carefully away from the crown of her head and remove a large disc of bone from her skull, using a tempered steel chisel and an obsidian hammer. For some time there was the sound of the tapping of the hammer on the chisel, as I performed the operation through the mind and hands of Muwaniwani. Eventually the disc was loosened and the brain exposed. I produced a small green emerald with a strange iridescence which Muwaniwani inserted between the two lobes of the brain.

"Replace the bone disc and tell me what happens."

"I have replaced the bone disc," said Muwaniwani in a hollow voice. "It looks as if the bone is fusing again . . . it is healing . . ."

"Replace the scalp," I said, concentrating hard on inducing the damaged tissues to heal, with all the mental powers at my disposal. The half-dead woman would henceforth cease to age. I had endowed her with immortality.

"I have replaced the scalp . . . the flesh is healing. The heart is beating normally. She breathes normally too," said Muwaniwani. "Her face has assumed a strange beauty, her body also. She seems to be taller than she was. But her hair has turned grey—a purplish-grey."

"Go on," I said.

"She has moved one arm—her eyes are now open. She is looking at you now, my master. There is surprise on her face. She has passed into unconsciousness again."

I sent a sharp mental command that shocked the unconscious woman back to life once more.

"What happened? Where am I?" she gasped.

"Do not ask silly questions," I snapped. "Tell me who you are. What is your name?"

"Noliyanda," she whispered. "I am Noliyanda, and yet I am not! I feel very strange."

"Close your eyes and tell me what you see."

"I see stars . . . a great darkness. I see strange men and women who shine, like the sun. I also see a great tree with animals growing from its branches like fruit. I see many strange things—thousands of people—monsters . . . No, I can't bear to look! It is such a vast spectacle . . ."

"What do you think it is?" I asked gently.

"Something tells me I am seeing the Birth of Eternity . . . and the furthest future. It is awe-inspiring . . . unbelievable . . . The gods and goddesses, and the Tree of Life are talking about me. They say I must be destroyed immediately. Why . . . what am I? What have you done to me? What have you turned me into . . . you blind and utterly wicked monster!"

"I have made you into my wife, Oh beautiful one," I said. "You are going to be the most perfect and most beautiful being in the Universe and you are mine, and mine only, Noliyanda. No god or goddess can harm you now, because I have turned you into a goddess yourself."

"You evil demon!" she cried. "You unclean and impious monster from the depths of hell! Who gave you the right to create me into a goddess?"

I brushed Muwaniwani aside and took Noliyanda in my arms—violently and with great passion. I was madly in love with her.

"I turned you into a goddess, because I love you, my Queen," I said harshly. "You are mine and nothing will ever take you away from me. Sleep now—take a good rest, my Queen."

* * * * *

Malandela, Celiwe and Dambisa-Luwewe woke up very early the next morning and began their three-day fast in preparation for the Ceremony of Adoption to be held on the night of the fourth day.

First Celiwe, the newly appointed High Queen of the Nguni, and Malandela, her consort, and Dambisa, Malandela's concubine, had to drink a strong mbiza purgative to clean out their stomachs. Then all three shut themselves in a hut whence they were not to emerge until the ceremony was over. They had to fast for three whole days, touching neither food nor drink, purifying themselves in preparation for a ceremony which would make the little boys, Zulu and Qwabe, Malandela's sons—a ceremony which is both strange and sacred.

The days and the nights flew by and at last the great day arrived and the Princess Nomikonto prepared the little boys for the Holy Ceremony which was to take place that night.

The little urchins first had to have their bowels cleaned out and this is a very simple and fascinating procedure. The only requirements are a small hollow reed, a bowl full of warm water and a nice fat ebony black piccanin. One end of the reed is smeared with fat, as a lubricant, and the piccanin is best caught by surprise. He must be made to lie flat on his little belly across somebody's lap. The reed is carefully inserted into the back passage and, needless to say, the piccanin will invariably squeal his big fuzzy-haired head off.

Nomikonto cleaned the bowels of both Zulu and Qwabe, who voiced their disapproval in no uncertain terms. Then she scrubbed them thoroughly—something they resented even more. In the meantime I had chosen two spotlessly white cows from my vast herds and these were slaughtered quickly in the morning and once more cooking was in progress within the kraal. This time no guests were invited because the Meat of Adoption must be eaten only by the people in whose kraal the adoption takes place. It must be eaten only at night in a darkened hut.

The bile sacs from the two cows were carefully preserved in a clay pot full of water. I ordered my first-rate cook Mboza to excel himself preparing food for the coming feast, because all the food to be eaten after the Ceremony of Adoption must be cooked to perfection. "And," I concluded, "if that food is not cooked to the highest peak of perfection, you will promptly take its place."

"My Great Chief," said the fat buck-toothed cook calmly, "on the day I cook you a bad meal, cut off my legs and I shall prepare them for you for supper."

"That sounds very appetising, Mboza. I am quite sure that you who have turned out so many good meals, will turn into one equally good!"

When Mboza left I called my first Rainbow Induna, Nsongololo, and told him to remove all the dogs in the Great Kraal to the neighbouring kraals and to tell everybody to observe absolute silence during the coming night.

* * * * *

Night falls and the Rainbow Indunas, both Nguni and Mambo, assemble in the Big Hut in which Malandela and his two women have fasted for the last three days. Nomikonto and the rest of the women also move to the hut in the gathering dusk—the hut which will henceforth be known as the Hut of the Adoption.

The females do not enter the hut yet. They must first bathe themselves in warm water just outside the entrance and then throw the dirty water in a great circle around the Hut of the Adoption, to keep away Tokoloshes and other Evil Spirits. To facilitate matters the great baked clay bowls used for face washing by the warriors in the morning have been arranged in a wide circle around the hut. Beside each bowl lies a loofah with which to scrub the body. The only women who will not attend the Ceremony are Muwaniwani and Nomeva, who are attending to my new Queen, Noliyanda, in the secret dwelling place under my Great Hut. I have told nobody about my Queen and my daughters have not yet suspected her presence. They are going to be the three angriest girls in the land on the day they find out about their new stepmother—of that I am very sure.

It is nearly midnight now and the ceremony begins. I have been chosen as Ceremony Leader. I raise my ebony staff and everybody, male and female, shed their raiment, necklaces, ear-rings, ear plugs, mutshas, loinskins and bracelets, and pile all these near the entrance of the hut. All stand dead still as I address them:

"We are here to take part in, and also to witness the ceremony in which Malandela, the son of Mitiyonke, and Celiwe, the daughter of Nyawo, take by the full Rights of Adoption, Zulu and Qwabe, the sons of the departed one, Bekizwe, as their own children. Henceforth Zulu and Qwabe shall be known as the sons of Malandela and the name Bekizwe shall not be connected with them as long as they live. The first rule of the ceremony requires that nobody in this hut shall think of anything except the proceedings here performed. You must observe this rule strictly because your ancestors and I can see clearly into the mind of every one of you. I am now going to ask the son of Mitiyonke the Seven Questions as the law requires and I expect each question to be answered clearly, truthfully and with all the sincerity at his command. Are you ready for the Seven Questions?"

"I am."

"Malandela, son of Mitiyonke, are you prepared to take these two children, Zulu and Qwabe, as your very own flesh and blood, your very own sons regardless of whether they grow up into brave men or cowards, into wise men or fools, into cruel men or kindly?"

"I am."

"Do you sincerely promise before the thrones of your Holy Ancestors to treat these children as your very own; to guide them as a father should; to chastise them and to teach them the laws and the customs of your tribe?"

"I do."

"Do you promise to protect these two children, and if necessary lay down your life for them?"

"I do."

"Do you promise to care for them in illness and ensure that they will never lack food?"

"I do."

"Do you promise that when these children offend you, you will never under any circumstances reveal in the heat of anger that you are not their father?"

"I do."

"Do you promise to love both children equally and never show favouritism to any one of them?"

"I solemnly swear to love both my children equally."

"Lastly, do you promise to leave an equal share of all your wordly wealth to both these children on the day you die?"

"I promise."

To Celiwe and Dambisa I address questions very similar—only small differences here and there in the wording.

Malandela picks up a ceremonial knife with a handle shaped like a fish, and heats its blade in the fire until it is red hot. With this razor-sharp red-hot knife he makes a long cut on the inside of his left thigh—a cut deep enough to bleed profusely. With blood from this cut he smears the two baby boys from head to foot, and taking both blood-bedecked children, one in either arm, he says slowly: "Be a witness, Oh my departed brother—and all you, my Ancestors, be witnesses. Witness that I am today making these two children my own flesh and blood. Be witness to the solemn oaths I have taken and the promises I make this night. As from this night men shall know both Zulu and Qwabe as the sons and heirs of Malandela. And future generations shall know and salute Zulu and Qwabe as the sons of Malandela. They are now my sons, and my sons they shall always be."

Celiwe sits down on the reed mat and Malandela places her little boys on her lap. She induces both to apply their mouths to her breasts, but Zulu protests with a loud scream. She also makes a small incision on the inside of her left thigh and smears the palms of both boys with her blood, saying: "I am your mother now, and you are my children. I shall love you with all my heart and with all my soul. With the gods and the spirits willing, my sons, I shall choose brides for you one day, and shall lead the dancers on both your wedding days."

She now takes both bile sacs from the bowl of water and empties their contents over the heads of the two little boys, saying: "This bile from a spotless white cow symbolises the birth fluid which covers you, Oh my sons, on this day of your being brought forth by me, your mother. May the Highest of the Most High grant you pleasant lives, my children, and a future unclouded by the storms of suffering and of trouble. May you walk in the sunshine and may the moon attend you at night. May your loins be ever fertile and may your brains be crowned with wisdom. This, my children, is my blessing to you."

Dambisa-Luwewe takes both the little boys and washes them thoroughly and then blesses them in her lilting foreign accent. She calls Zulu the 'Lion of Sunrise' and Qwabe the 'Fount of Wisdom and Courage'. She wishes them each a thousand wives and a million warriors at their command. Then the girls and women, and both Nguni and Mambo Rainbow Indunas, take their turns in saluting and blessing the two boys. Malandela heats the knife red hot once again and cauterizes the cuts on both his and Celiwe's thighs.

Everybody leaves the Hut of Adoption and joins in the great feast laid out in my Great Hut. Here the Feast of Adoption proceeds in the dark. But in due course dawn's fiery hues start kissing the eastern sky.

The Hut of the Adoption is ceremoniously burnt to the ground and each Rainbow Induna receives as a present from Celiwe a small gourd containing the ashes of the hut as a fertility charm.

The two little boys are carried by heralds on great war shields and presented to the Nguni and Mambo warriors amidst thunderous cheers. With this the Ceremony of Adoption is concluded.

* * * * * *

Three days later we led the powerful combined armies of the Nguni and the Western Mambo back eastward with the intention of wresting the Nguni throne from Vamba Nyaloti, the Vamangwe murderer and usurper, and reinstating Celiwe and Malandela as rulers of the land of the Nguni.

We made good progress on our journey towards the Great Kraal of the Nguni and to our great surprise the people in the kraals we passed welcomed us with open arms. Some of them even fell on their faces before Malandela and Celiwe and asked them—begged them, with tears in their eyes—to save them from someone whom they simply called the Horrible Beastess who was now ruling them with unbelievable cruelty. They told us that this beastess had overthrown Vamba somehow and had seized power in the land. She was now terrorizing both Vamangwe and Nguni alike and every tenth day she had the habit of sending bands of her evil followers to scour the country for ten of the most handsome youths and maidens. These young people were taken to the Great Kraal and there sacrificed to this evil and mad beastess, whose real name was Muxakaza, who had once been Malandela's First Queen.

Determined to crush this infernal mad woman, I urged the army to make the journey to the Nguni Great Kraal in a forced march that shortened the three days' journey by a full two days. But when we reached the kraal, we found it deserted, save for an old man named Ngozo, who met us at the gate and prostrated himself before Malandela.

"Where is the Beastess, Ngozo?" asked Malandela, "and what has happened to everybody?"

"The Beastess sensed you coming, High Ones, and fled across the Zambezi together with the rest of the Vamangwe people," said the old man. "But Vamba, or what is left of him, is in one of the huts together with his mother, who is vainly trying to nurse him back to health."

"Vamba!" bellowed Malandela. "Take me to him this very moment! Let me see that murdering, treacherous dog and run him through with the spear."

"I do not think you need defile your spear with that creature's blood, Oh Lion of the Nguni," said Ngozo. "Vamba is already dying—he has been dying for ten days now. Come and see."

Malandela followed the old man Ngozo to the hut where Vamba was dying. We all followed him and stood just outside the hut as Malandela went in, spear in hand. There was a loud yell of fear and horror from within the hut and Malandela crawled out of the small entrance as if all the evil spirits in hell were after him. "Gods of my Fathers—it is horrible, it is utterly horrible!"

"What is it, my brother?" asked Nomikonto.

"Vamba is in there with his mother, and both are rotting—rotting away while still alive. Vamba is glowing like a firefly and his flesh is disintegrating before your very eyes. Set this hut on fire . . . burn it down!"

"So," cried Celiwe. "This is the source of the horrible stench that hangs over the kraal. Vamba has at last got his just deserts! Burn down the whole kraal—we can build a new one elsewhere. It has seen far too many sins for far too long."

Soon the kraal was one mass of flames from which a dense column of smoke rose to the very heavens, attracting thousands of people from the neighbouring kraals. And out of the roaring mass of ravening flames came the sound of shrill demon laughter. All the people turned and fled for their lives down the gentle slope, leaving the courageous Nguni dwarf Malangabi and his gigantic deaf-mute friend Ngovolo and myself standing our ground at the gate of the burning kraal.

"What do you see, Oh Malangabi?" I asked. "Tell me what you see."

There was a short pause and then: "By the shrivelled buttocks of my first ancestor—I see a corpse capering about in the flames, listen . . ."

Ghostly laughter reached our ears, and then Vamba's voice: "I am immortal; I am indestructible; I shall live forever!"

The smell of burning flesh grew stronger in my nostrils as the sizzling remains of Vamba came staggering out of the flames and made straight for us, leaving a trail of smoking pieces of charred flesh behind.

"Stop!" I shouted. "Stop, you foul thing and answer my questions."

"What questions?"

"Where is the Bronze Idol of Zima-Mbje?"

"She has got it, ha, ha, ha. But before she took it, I exposed myself to its glow. I am immortal, indestructible . . . ha, ha, ha . . ."

"Thing most foul—perish! I command you!"

The rotten living cadaver sagged to the ground and one thigh bone broke with a dull crack and telescoped through the flesh. It opened its smoking mouth and croaked: "I know you—I know who you are."

"You don't need to tell me," I said. "I am the Lost Immortal . . . Lumukanda."

"Yes," croaked what was left of Vamba, trying to rise, but failing as his flesh tore from the bones. "Yes, but you are also my father!"

"What?"

"You, Lumukanda . . . are my real father. Remember . . . dumb maiden, Luojoyo?"

Luojoyo! So Vamba—Vamba the evil, the ruthless Vamba, was the son of Luojoyo. Luojoyo, one of the hundreds of maidens whom I have loved and discarded in the many, many years of my ceaseless wanderings through the land. Luojoyo, one of the many girls who had loved me fiercely and then with whom I had to part for one reason or another. Girls whom I had loved briefly, fiercely, during short stays in villages and kraals here and there, and whom I had forgotten soon afterwards, but who had never forgotten me, because they had become mothers of my children—evil children who had inherited their father's worst traits.

There were scores of my children all over the land and only the Great Spirit knew when one of them would cross my path again. I felt tears starting into my eyes and flowing down my cheeks. I had spread evil all over the land and no wonder the gods hated me. I had befouled the land of mortal men with my evil spawn—evil children like Vamba. When, Oh when would I clash head on with one of them again?

“So,” croaked Malangabi. “So you are Vamba’s father.”

“Yes,” I replied, “I am the dead Vamba’s father.”

* * * * *

Afterwards Ngozo told us how Vamba came to be afflicted with the malady which had rotted the flesh from his body while he yet lived. The Beastess, Muxakaza, had tricked Vamba into giving her the Bronze Idol of Zima-Mbje and had used the evil idol’s powers to overthrow Vamba and to afflict him with the strange consuming disease. Vamba’s mother had tried in vain to cure her son and had contracted his deadly malady for her pains. Luojoyo . . . my Luojoyo!

* * * * *

I did not leave the land of the Nguni until I was sure that Malandela and Celiwe were safely and happily reinstated as the rightful rulers. Malandela, of course, was no longer a king—he was now a mere consort and it was the wise and kindhearted Celiwe who ruled supreme as High Chieftainess of the Nguni.

This strange reversal of roles brought many a smile from the old men of the Nguni tribe, who had forced Celiwe, as High Chieftainess, to take two extra husbands besides Malandela, as the law states that all women of her rank should do. Celiwe had agreed to do this, most reluctantly, with a lot of sobbing and copious tears. She had chosen Mabovu, a tall handsome warrior, and she had also chosen the grey-haired Mambo philosopher warrior Mpungoso, who had presided over the famous Peace Ceremony between the Mambo and the Nguni. Malandela, Mpongoso and Mabovu were all tall and powerful men who dwarfed the pretty girlish chieftainess as a marula tree dwarfs a thornbush. “By my fathers . . .!” the one-eyed dwarf Malangabi had sworn after the Little Queen had made her choice of extra husbands, “Have you seen anything like it? How is a small and delicate woman like Celiwe going to cope with the demands of such hulking monsters? I would never be Celiwe for all the riches in the world.”

“Do not worry about her, Malangabi,” said the old Rainbow Induna Solozi. “Celiwe is a woman-and-a-half. She can love any one of those thin-blooded scarecrows to death any time. Why, if she had chosen an experienced old cock like me . . .”

“There you go again, you lying old boaster,” growled Malangabi. “You have never loved any woman in your whole life, and yet you call yourself experienced!”

“I have loved hundreds of women, my boy,” boasted the old liar vehemently. “Dare you doubt my word?”

“Aaarrgh!” Malangabi spat disgustedly before turning away.

After Celiwe had chosen her husbands, she held a great feast to celebrate her return to the land of the Nguni and also to honour her sister-in-law, Nomikonto, who had also declared the handsome singer Ziko to be her husband.

The marriage of Nomikonto and Ziko, however, was not a happy one, because Nomikonto continued to nurse a private hatred for men—a hatred that started to grow in her soul that eventful night when Mukingo ravished her. Strong is the truth behind the old saying of the tribes that "a raped woman makes a thorny wife". This marriage was destined to break up shatteringly, resulting in Ziko's death when we needed him most during the great journey to the south.

When, after a stay of nearly a whole moon, the time came for me to return home to the land of the Mambo, I knew I was leaving the Nguni a happy, contented tribe, in the hands of a kind-hearted and wise woman who was doing her best to erase the hatred for Malandela in the hearts of her many subjects. Already people were beginning to call Celiwe their Little Mother.

BEHOLD THE COMET

I CANNOT see her, but I can hear her voice and I can see the sorrow clouding her deep immortal heart. In her hands she is holding an ugly ebony doll and she is fondling the lifeless thing as if it were a baby. I can actually feel the great beauty of her—a beauty she radiates as the sun radiates heat at midday. Her sigh is a barely audible caress in the confines of the silent underground chamber. I hear her as she puts the doll down carefully on the tiny mat she has woven for it and covers it tenderly with a small wildcat skin blanket. I hear her crooning nonsense to the ugly doll—the kind of nonsense a mother croons to her baby when she wants it to sleep.

She comes towards me and I await her coming with bated breath. Her arms encircle my neck and her perfectly moulded body is pressed fiercely against mine. I feel her heavy breasts, her abdomen and thighs against mine. Her warm, trembling lips seek mine.

She releases me from the fury of her embrace with a shuddering sigh and steps back. "Gods of the gods . . . if only I can see you!"

"What is the use?" she asks at length. "Of what use is my loving you, my lord and husband, if I can bear you no young? Lo, my womb is more barren than the sands of the Ka-Lahari, where the skulking Bushmen live. My breasts are for nothing and never will I feel a baby's tender mouth extract nourishment from them. Oh my husband, I am so . . . so ashamed of myself."

"You have nothing to be ashamed of, Oh my adorable creature—you, who are the most perfect, most beautiful being in the land, have nothing to be ashamed of, except that you are the wife of an immortal to whom the gates of the land of the gods are barred. My love for you and your slowly flowering love for me is worth more than a million babies."

"The duty of the female throughout the length and breadth of Creation is to conceive, carry and bring forth young. Of what use is the rocky beauty of a barren desert? Of what use is a barren woman, mortal or immortal?"

"Noliyanda," I chide her, "be quiet. Do you want those above to hear your voice?"

"My husband, you must reveal me to your daughters and to the people you rule. I am sick of hiding like a mouse in a hole from your naughty daughters. They can do me no harm, although they have cut the throat of many a woman you loved. I want you to present me to your people and your children, and then I would like to select for you the three most beautiful mortal women for your second, third and fourth queens. I shall ask these women to bear children for me. I shall adopt them; I adore children."

"The children I beget grow up into evil people, Noliyanda. I have no wish to spread farther my evil-tainted spawn."

"The goodness or the evilness of a child depends on how he or she is brought up. There is no such thing as an inherited evil."

"Noliyanda, I love you. I love you more than I have ever loved any woman or goddess before." I kiss her forehead, cheeks, and we rub noses together.

"Ha!" she laughs. "So the great Lumukanda loves his own creation! Does a sane potter ever love the pot she has made? Does a wood carver ever love the image he has whittled out of the unfeeling ebony? Tell me, Oh my creator, my god and my husband, what is love? Love is nothing but a euphemism for animal desire. Love is what a man feels for a woman before he takes her to the love mat. Love is only a form of hunger: a yearning to possess and to keep, and the inter-dependence of male and female beings."

"A truce to your nonsense, Oh my wife. We must now . . ."

A familiar voice cuts my words short. "Father, what are you doing down there and who are you talking to?"

"He is talking to me," says Noliyanda pleasantly.

"Who in the name of all that is evil are you?" demands my first daughter Luanaledi.

"Come down, Oh children," says Noliyanda gently. "Come down here and meet me."

"Who are you?" cries Mvurayakucha fiercely.

"I am your father's new wife—your step-mother."

"Our what?"

"You heard me, child, I am your step-mother."

"Will you please say that again," hisses Mvurayakucha. "Have we heard you correctly?"

"Children, come down here and let us talk properly and stop being so rude."

The two eldest girls come down the ladder, but the youngest, Mbaliyamswira, remains above; she has foreseen trouble for her two sisters.

"How did this woman get here, and when did you have this secret dwelling made?" Luanaledi demands.

Before I can answer, the second girl's voice cuts in coldly, savagely: "So this is our new mother—all beauty, large breasts and broad hips. A voluptuous, moist-lipped and obviously hot-blooded slut. From which malarial swamp did you fish her, my father?"

"He found me growing from a marula tree," says Noliyanda with a smile. "Don't tell me he did not inform you!"

"Is that the reason why you smell like fermented marulas in a dead warthog's stomach?" queries Mvurayakucha nastily. "And when are you going to be ripe for the bush pigs to eat, Oh beautiful marula?"

Luanaledi, who has been studying Noliyanda closely, suddenly chips in: "I know what this thing is. She is not a mortal woman; she is a goddess. How terrible—how disgusting!"

I sense anger rising in Noliyanda's soul—anger so terrible that I can feel the bolts of fear tearing through me like lightning through storm-pregnant clouds. "Luanaledi, Mvurayakucha, stop your nonsense and get out of here."

Too late! There is a loud crackling clap of mountain thunder and an invisible force hits me full in the chest and sends me crashing back against the wall of the chamber. With a loud scream the lithe form of one of my daughters falls across my thighs. Then, to my great surprise, I slip into unconsciousness.

But not completely. Across an infinite distance I hear Noliyanda's voice: "My lord and husband, what . . . what have I done! I did not mean it, honestly . . . it just happened . . ."

I hear a loud wail, and a shrill scream of horror, surprise and fear. Then Luanaledi's voice, charged with bitter hatred and unfathomable grief shrieks accusingly: "You monster, you vile demon from the sewers of hell . . . you have killed her!"

"Child, I did not know . . . I did not know I had these powers," cries Noliyanda in a voice shrill with pain and grief.

Another voice comes to me, a voice dull and hollow with pain so great that only an immortal can feel and still live: "Lua, sister Lua . . . call father . . ."

"What is it?" I cry, as things come into focus again. "What is it? What happened . . . tell me."

"Father," cries Luanaledi, helping me to my feet. "This foul mistress from hell you concocted, has murdered Mvurayakucha. You must destroy her . . . destroy this unearthly evil creature!"

"Mvurayakucha?" I ask hollowly, unable to comprehend. "But nothing can harm you children. We are all indestructible."

"But immortals and gods can destroy each other, though nothing mortal can destroy or harm us," cries Luanaledi. "Father Mvurayakucha is a horrible sight. She is blistered all over and her face is all but gone. There is a gaping hole in her chest. Her heart still beats . . . do something for her quick, father!"

"Mvurayakucha's voice, strange and hollow sounding, floats up to me from where she is lying in the corner: "Father . . . end my misery . . . take away my immortality . . . destroy me."

I make my way to where my second daughter is lying and I can smell charred flesh. The suddenness of the whole episode has left my brain numb. My knees become very weak indeed. For once I am glad of my blindness. I am glad I cannot see what is left of one of my beautiful daughters. "I can recreate, you, child, I will . . ."

"No father, I do not want to live. Life is too futile and sickening. Destroy me quickly—the pain is too great. And help Lua too . . . she is also hurt."

I stand over my child and I have to fight back the tears. A Master of Eternal Life is not supposed to weep, and I seem to have acquired the mortal's habits of weeping lately. I concentrate all my mental powers and with the utmost effort I project them—focus them on Mvurayakucha, and as though an unseen bolt of hissing lightning strikes her, she dissolves into a cloud of warm air. I turn and ask Luanaledi to tell me just what happened.

"This foul monster hurled a bolt of concentrated mental power at us, father. My sister received it full blast, but I was hurled clear and fell on top of you. My left hand has been burnt off at the wrist and the pain is getting unbearable."

"I reach out and touch Luanaledi. It brings her immediate relief from the pain. I concentrate on her arm and the wound closes . . . it gradually heals. But, as from now, she will have only one hand."

"Father, destroy this evil creature," Luanaledi commands. "I insist that you do so now!"

I just cannot bring myself to destroy her. I love her too much. Now I have to choose between my daughters and someone whom I really love. The object of my affection has just murdered one of my children; must I punish her? My soul is tossed about like a leaf in a hurricane of indecision as I take a step towards Noliyanda . . .

"No father, do not kill her," says the voice of my youngest daughter Mbaliyamswira. "My two eldest sisters got what they fully deserved."

"What!" cries Luanaledi, in great surprise.

"Yes, big sister," says the younger girl from the top of the primitive ladder, "you seem to forget that there are High Laws in the Universe which all beings, mortal and immortal should, and must, obey. Respect for one's parents and chosen superiors is one such law. The gods of the forests, of the rivers and plains, must respect the First Goddess, Ninavanh-Ma, at all times, and the First Goddess must respect the Great Spirit, who must respect the Ultimate Cause, subject in turn to the Most Ultimate, the Grand God of all gods Himself. Respect is one of the ten pillars of the Universe, and humility is another. But sister Lua, we have never shown any respect to our father or for those whom he loves—whom we must respect for our father's sake. And today we have reaped the bitter harvest of our lack of respect. Although we love our father most sincerely—and in a way which shocks both gods and mortal men, a way considered to be evil and unnatural by all creatures in the Universe—we must remember that he is our parent, our lawful superior, and that there are things we must not do to him—nor to those he has chosen as his mates, be they mortals, goddesses, or creatures of his own creating.

"Sister Lua, a parent, be he mortal or immortal, human or animal, god, man or tree, is more than just a 'thing' that had brought forth young. A parent is to his or her young the representative of the Most Ultimate Himself and the respect due to him or her from the young is not something they—the young—can give or withhold at will; it is a compulsion—a duty."

Slowly Noliyanda rises from where she was sitting and approaches Luanaledi and Mbaliyamswira, who had come down the ladder while she was speaking. She reaches out her arms and takes both girls in a tender embrace. The three females sob loudly and I turn away, climb the ladder to the surface on heavy legs. I reach the floor of the Great Hut, and I shut the door in the floor carefully behind me.

A voice reaches my ears. It is calling loudly, excitedly, outside the closed door of the Great Hut. It is the voice of Nsongololo, my first Rainbow Induna.

It seems as if night has fallen long ago, but strangely, instead of being asleep in their huts, the inhabitants of my kraal are milling around in the clearing and shouting at the tops of their voices. I wonder what has happened. Once more Nsongololo knocks at the wickerwork door of my hut, shouting very excitedly: "Great Chief, wake up, there is a Star of War in the sky . . . an ill omen of great bloodshed."

A Star of War, and much bloodshed. So that is what has excited the people so much. A very rare thing is in the sky out there: a great comet. A comet, large and terrible looking is dominating the star-bejewelled, cloudless autumn skies, like a hideous demon from the deepest pits of hell. A comet—a star which the tribes fear more than anything that can ever appear in the skies. A comet, and also a total solar eclipse, are regarded by the tribes throughout the length and breadth of the land as omens of disasters to come—disasters that would claim thousands of lives.

A comet! It is the duty of every chief in the land above whose skies a comet appears, immediately to sacrifice his first-born son or daughter by burning him or her alive in a pit full of charcoal and cow dung to placate the dread Star of War. The people out there are waiting for me to bring out my daughters, and drag out my adopted son Mukombe, to sacrifice them in a great fire pit to the beat of drums and the wail of flutes. Well, they are going to be very disappointed . . .

Outside, the cool night air is fanning my body and face. I can feel the eyes of everyone turn towards me and all the excitement, the loud shouting and gesticulating, dies down. An expectant hush claims the kraal as the people turn and come slowly to where I am standing, flanked by Nsongololo, Ntombela and Mavimbela, all three carrying lighted torches. (A chief must always be accompanied by Indunas carrying torches when walking about his kraal at night.)

"My people," I shout in the silence, "listen to me—Lumukanda, your immortal High Chief. I know what you are expecting me to do now in view of that star you see in the sky above. But I shall not do it!"

I pause and listen in great satisfaction to the gusty gasp of collective surprise that escapes from more than two thousand mouths and it fills me with a sense of elation such as I have never experienced before. There is nothing like disappointing bloodthirsty people. It is like cheating hyenas of their prey!

"I say once again that I am your High Chief and as far as I am concerned, there is no Star of War in the sky. I am your blind Chief and I do not see any Star of War. What your chief does not see, you must also not see."

"But there is one, Oh Chief, there is," protests a voice in the crowd. "There is a War Star in the sky."

"Warriors, seize that man and bring him to me."

The man is promptly seized and brought to where I stand, and he is none other than Govu, one of my ten best cooks. "So at last I am going to have a cook for breakfast. Listen Govu, I have heard of men being cooked in a pot of their own shaping which, as you know, is an old tribal idiomatic expression. But at last I am going to have the satisfaction of literally experiencing and tasting a cook being cooked in his own cooking pot! And what is more, you are first going to wash and prepare the pot herbs and yams which will flavour your stew. Take him away."

They drag him off and I continue: "Does anyone still insist that there is a War Star in the sky? If so, kindly step forward."

Nobody steps forward. But all eyes are focused on me and I quietly proceed: "You say there is a War Star in the skies, and you say it is an omen of war and evil to come. I say again, and without fear of contradiction," and I point to a great stew pot, "that it is a warning and not an ill omen—a warning to all of us to prepare and not to waste time on all kinds of ceremonies. We must start immediately. You must help me strengthen your armies, help me raise our regiments from five to ten. I am going to send messengers to all the districts in the land first thing tomorrow. I want each district to contribute five hundred men. I want blacksmiths, shield makers and iron miners to work day and night—on pain of instant death if they do not. I want spears, 'man-killing' arrows, bows, weapons—all this within ten days from now. You must stop gawking at that star and help me to make the army of the Mambo the strongest in the land."

There is a burst of thunderous applause from the massed warriors and peasants. Even the women join in the cheering. There is a loud gasp from the people as Noliyanda crawls out of the Great Hut and stands just behind me, a little to my right.

"My lord and husband, I beg to speak to the people." Her low throaty voice is nevertheless musical.

"You have my permission."

"Children of the Mambo," says Noliyanda, "I have something to tell you and also a confession to make. You are very surprised to see me, I can tell, because none of you knew of my presence until now. I am not a human being like you; I am not a spirit either. I was brought back to life in a secret underground chamber under this hut by your Great Chief Lumukanda, who is a master of Eternal Life . . ."

The people let out loud screams of astonishment and press closer to have a look at Noliyanda. The warriors venture closer with exclamations of "Hawu, Impossible, whew! Is she a real woman?"

"Children of the Mambo," continues Noliyanda, "I have just caused the death of the second of the three daughters of your Great Chief and the loss of the right hand of the eldest."

But the people are not interested in what she is saying; they are only interested in her. The other women press forward and the hideous ape-woman Nunu tears the leopard-skin cloak from Noliyanda's shoulders and feels her smooth skin with an innocent curiosity.

Lulama-Maneruana and the other girls and women crowd around my new queen and tear the skin skirt off her waist. They just cannot bring themselves to believe that she is real and alive—as real and as alive as they themselves are—and Noliyanda seizes both Nunu and Maneruana by the backs of their necks and playfully bumps their foreheads together.

"By the breasts of Ma, the thing can fight," says Maneruana.

The warriors and Indunas surge still further forward and deluge me with a flood of questions: "What are you going to do with it, Oh Chief. It speaks like a human being, but is it truly one? Shall we kill it, Oh Chief?"

The warriors also reach out grimy, calloused hands to touch Noliyanda, but the Rainbow Indunas curse them and tell them to stop. With loud giggles and much chattering the women and girls carry Noliyanda away to their hut—as excited children would do with a toy they wished to show to their friends.

* * * * *

Noliyanda had tried to introduce herself to the people. She had tried to make them accept her as a human being. But she had failed miserably. For many years the people always referred to her as "Into" (the Thing); they always called her It and never She.

For twenty-one days after the appearance of the dread Star of War my Rainbow Indunas and I were very busy indeed. Fortified war rafts were built and canoes were hollowed out, while sleds drawn by oxen brought great bundles of weapons of all kinds from the twelve districts of the land of the Mambo to the Great Kraal Tulisizwe.

The scent of war was in the air, and we were prepared.

THEY WHO MUST DIE

THE messenger was staggering with exhaustion. He was in the very last stages of weariness. A huge message stick was clutched tightly in his hand and his hard mouth was grey with hunger and thirst. He had not had time to drink from the many streams he crossed. He had to deliver the message and . . . die.

Valindlu, the son of Nopempe, knew that each weary step was bringing him nearer to the grave. The High Law of the Tribes says that all bearers of evil tidings must be killed immediately and instantly after they have delivered their unsavoury message or news.

Valindlu was past caring. All he was worried about was that the message he was carrying should be quickly delivered to the cannibal High Chief of the Mambo as quickly as possible.

It was evil news indeed.

At long last the messenger saw the kraal, standing out against the dense forests surrounding it like a wound—a great circular wound on a thick-haired warrior's head. He saw the tiny distant figures of warriors and women moving about among the countless huts like so many ants. He heard the faint sounds as women called out to each other. Noise-loving things, women. The messenger began to think about Tandi, his bride of ten days, back there in the war-torn land of the Nguni. What would become of her? Tears flooded the messenger's eyes as he realised with shocking finality that he was really going to die that day, die and never see Tandi again!

He crushed his feelings; the law says one must be ready to sacrifice all for the sake of the tribe. The Nguni tribe is in great danger. The long-awaited invasion from the south has come and savage hordes of the tyrant of Zima-Mbje, the Munumutaba, have crossed the Zambezi and are ruthlessly laying waste the land of the Nguni. They have come to exterminate, and not to conquer or enslave. The Nguni regiments were fighting back fiercely when the messenger left with the message from Celiwe, from the besieged Royal Kraal. But the brave Ngunis needed help; they alone could not hope to stem the tide of murderous Mashonas and half-castes together with a moderate sprinkling of the dread foreigners, known as the Feared Ones — these long-haired, long-bearded, light-skinned Arabi, with noses like the beaks of vultures.

The army pouring across the Zambezi is the strangest the land has ever seen, and it was the most ruthless army the Nguni and the Mambo have ever been called upon to face.

Thus, the tired messenger ran the remaining distance towards the Great Kraal Tulisizwe. He entered the main gate at full speed and promptly slipped on a slick of thin dung deposited by a sick cow, and fell flat on his back. A Rainbow Induna took the long message stick from the ground where the unfortunate man had fallen, scanned the message briefly, shook his head and gave a brief order to four warriors before turning away. Four long-bladed new spears tore into the body of the fallen man and he was no more.

Noliyanda read the message to me and even before she had finished, I was on my feet and groping for my great war spear. The message read: "Evil Plenty. Our land. Under attack. Royal Kraal. Besieged. Beg help."

I crawled out of the Great Hut with Noliyanda close behind me and yelled at the servant boy sitting just outside to sound the battle horn he held. The boy leapt up to obey and the sound of the great horn floated over the kraal. The Rainbow Indunas came running out of their huts and stood before me—all fully armed.

"Our long wait is over, men, this is war! You know what to do—do it!" I snapped.

In the short space of half-a-day the great Mambo impi of ten regiments and approximately a hundred thousand men was ready for war. From each of the ten great military kraals neighbouring the Great Kraal, came two heavily armed regiments in full battle order. Leaving two regiments, the Stormclouds and the Hornets, to guard the land, I dispatched five regiments overland under Nsongololo and Ntombela.

I took the remaining three regiments to the riverside and embarked with them on the war rafts—the massive fleet of battle canoes and barges. These regiments, directly under my leadership, with Mavimbela, the Rainbow Induna, as my second-in-command, were to be used in cutting off the Munumutaba's retreat and in keeping the Zambezi clear of his ferry barges and supply canoes. They were also to be used in lifting the siege of the Nguni Royal Kraal, situated near the great river. The Munumutaba was soon going to find he had lifted a stone with a scorpion poised under it; he was about to regret the day he set foot in the two lands under my protection. The vain egomaniac was unaware of what he was up against. I was ready to thrash the pelt off his miserable carcass and send him back to Zima-Mbje with his tail between his legs like the miserable cur he was.

The great battle rafts, fifty in all, huge things made of logs with a raised platform in the centre on which are built ten skin covered huts, glided slowly and carefully down the river. We entered the Zambezi from the Luangwa. These rafts were manned by the regiments called the Crocodiles and the Crabs, and the third regiment, the Leguans, followed the raft spearhead in the fleet of battle canoes and barges. Just as the leading craft, in which I was, glided past a stretch of crocodile-infested reeds bordering the great river, I heard my Rainbow Induna Mavimbela give a loud shout of excitement.

"Look at that! Oh, what a rare sight—what a good omen!"

"What is it?"

"An omen of victory, Great One. Two otters, fighting like drunken demons amongst the reeds. Look there, you stupid sons of Mambo goat thieves, look over there. We are going to win this war! We are going to trounce those impotent sons of bush pigs from Zima-Mbje and I am going to un-man the first son of a double-sexed hyæna who says we won't!"

A thunderous cheer shook the great rafts, following such strong words from the grizzled old crocodile hunter, who was also a fisherman of renown. The confidence among my warriors mounted; every man was suddenly fired with enthusiasm and a raging desire to come to grips with the enemy.

Night fell and the laughing stars twinkled mockingly down at the ancient earth from their lofty thrones in the skies above. The heavenly river, the milky way, was a great smoky band of living silver, jewelled with millions of stars. The sullen river reflected the glorious sky and loud in our ears was the song of frogs amongst the reeds. In the frowning forests on either bank of the mighty river lions roared savagely in the naked night.

Hyænas laughed in the dark, and now and again the loud wail of a love-thirsty jackal added more discord to the disturbed night, the untamed night, invisible to me, but yet so distinctly audible. This was not a night for men to seek the enemy; it was a night for men to seek the soft arms of those they loved. This was the sort of night in whose embrace Wise Men sat near dying fires, swathed in karosses, meditating—meditating on history already made, not participating in history about to be made. This was indeed a night made for peace.

The whispering dawn sets fire to the Eastern sky; a weary sun climbs slowly up to usher in yet another day over an ungrateful earth. The dew vanishes from the grass and the clinging morning mist flees like a sneaking thief before the High Chief of Day. In the trees the birds sing their morning love song to the cool breeze—and directly in front of us, lo! the hated enemy we seek.

A fleet of thirty barges full of Luvijiti warriors is trying to cross the Zambezi. Paddles lash the water as the barges labour across the current and there are shouts of surprise as the enemy sees our giant rafts bearing down upon them. I give no command to attack—none is needed; I hear a series of sharp twangs as the Mambo archers send volley after volley of arrows at the enemy boats. There is a bone-wrenching shock as our raft rams two barges and capsizes them, spilling the Luvijiti warriors to the crocodiles. Loud screams of agony rise as the Mambo archers send more flights of arrows tearing into the struggling, drowning men. Dead bodies are borne down river by the current and there is a cloud of bright red blood on the waters of the timeless Zambezi.

The enemy rallies as the warriors recover from their surprise. They fight back bravely and their arrows tear into the ranks of the Mambo massed on the battle rafts. But the Luvijiti barges are rammed mercilessly one after the other and their occupants become ready food for fishes and crocodiles now massing to partake of the spoil.

The great fleet of Mambo war rafts, barges and canoes glides onward, with a long trail of tiger fish and crocodiles whose appetites have apparently only been stimulated. We meet ten more Luvijiti barges and we ram them savagely out of existence, to the satisfaction of only a small portion of our greedy rearguard.

Gradually we leave the middle of the river and edge our way closer to the northern bank of the mighty Zambezi. In the far distance we see Malandela's kraal, with thousands of enemy warriors swarming around it like flies around a honeycomb. Some of the huts are burning and the smoke is climbing lazily into the cloudless skies.

On my brisk command, two regiments thunder off the rafts and swarm up on the bank, falling immediately into battle order. Two men who refuse to disembark, due to a sudden attack of cowardice, are promptly shorn of their members of manhood and flung into the river.

"Forward! Forward!" I shout.

The great crescent of warriors rolls through the forest. I am leading at the southern point, and Mavimbela is leading at the northern point with a battery of foul curses. We tear into the rearmost ranks of the besieging Luvijiti with the fury of a charging rhinoceros. Men whom I can sense but not see go down under the crushing blows of the iron-studded club I am wielding with both hands. No shield on earth can withstand the tremendous weapon in my hands.

Spears hiss past me and men cry out as they fall on either side. Spurting blood drenches my legs with warm stickiness, clotting and peeling off. The sickening sounds of spears thudding home in human bodies and axes cracking and splitting skulls, mixed with hoarse screams and groans, are all around me. The enemy tries to disengage and re-form, but this I shall not allow them to do. We press the enemy hard and fight our way forward without pause, towards Malandela's kraal. And above the din of battle a familiar voice bellows in my ear: "We have got them surrounded, Oh High Chief. We have surrounded the adulterous sons of double-sexed, splay-footed hyænas!"

"Is that you, Oh Mavimbela?" I yell.

"It is I, Oh Great Chief."

"Let us then press them hard. We must give them no breathing space."

"They won't get the slightest chance for that, Oh High One. We are pressing them closer than a lover presses his sweetheart at the great moment."

"Forward!" I shout at the top of my voice. "Forward and annihilate the Luvijiti dogs!"

There is a savage torrent of Nguni war cries as they break out of their Great Kraal and fall upon the hated enemy which has been threatening them for four days. Like hawks released from captivity, the three husbands of the little Nguni Chieftainess Celiwe lead a gallant charge by twenty thousand yelling warriors. The besieging Luvijiti are thrown into confusion and they fall in their hundreds . . . and along with them fall many of their hateful foreign allies, the Arabi.

* * * * *

The siege of the Nguni Great Kraal is a thing of the past. In half-a-day's savage battle more than fifty thousand Luvijiti, five hundred Mambo and ten thousand Nguni have been killed. But the great war is by no means over. In fact, it has just begun!

The clever dog of a Munumutaba has not used all his forces in the invasion of the land of the Nguni. The bulk of his armies is encamped south of the Zambezi and it would appear that his intention is to attack us from as many points as possible at the same time. In fact, he had merely diverted our attention from the main objective he wishes to attack.

The Nguni Great Kraal has been relieved and the enemy hordes which besieged it have been annihilated to the last man. But there are still strong Luvijiti regiments carrying all before them in the land of the Nguni and these must be destroyed first before we can think of launching a counter-attack upon the Munumutaba beyond the Zambezi.

When my First Rainbow Induna, Nsongololo, arrived with the five Western Mambo regiments I had dispatched overland, we decided to launch an immediate attack on the marauding invaders laying waste the land of the Nguni. We left three regiments in the Nguni Royal Kraal, two Nguni and one Mambo, under the joint command of Mabovu and Ngovolo. These regiments were to work closely with the river-borne Mambo regiments I had left in the river to man the war rafts and the canoes, to keep the river clear of Luvijiti barges.

Malandela, Mpungoso and I led the powerful combination of seven Mambo and ten Nguni regiments in search of the Luvijiti marauders who, reports said, were under the command of the youngest of the great Munumutaba's twelve sons, Munengu.

For ten days we followed the enemy who seemed to be determined to avoid capture and destruction. But on the eleventh day we came upon the vast Luvijiti camp just before sunset and we slowly but surely encircled it, keeping out of sight in the great forests. When night fell, the unsuspecting enemy was trapped in a deadly double circle of nearly fifty thousand fighting men. Secure in the knowledge that the enemy forces had no chance of escape, I sent word to all the regiments to have a good night's sleep, because I intended wiping the foe off the land early in the morning. Thus, in the dark depths of the frowning forest, the Nguni and Mambo built carefully covered cooking fires and cooked their supper—mainly meat and corn cakes.

It has always been attractive to me to spend the night with mortal men who were going to gamble their lives bravely against a ruthless enemy the next morning. It is fascinating to see just how differently men feel the night before about their coming ordeal. The words so dear to beggardly story tellers: "brave and fearless warriors" are but a putrid myth. No mortal is ever truly brave in battle and the picture often etched in our minds of a fearless and cool-headed warrior slaying a thousand of the foe is so much make-believe.

On the eve of a battle a warrior is either as scared as a wet kaross or he is resigned to death, but determined to do as much damage to the enemy as possible before being killed. Very often this strange resignation to death and a raging desire to kill as many of the enemy before being killed, has been mistaken for courage. Once one is resigned to death and ready to receive it with open arms, one can still live to die peacefully through old age.

Many of the older warriors and Indunas in both the Mambo and the Nguni armies had been going into battle totally resigned to being killed or maimed, but only after they had dispatched as many of the enemy to hell as they possibly could. Such men were Nsongololo, Mavimbela and three other famous Nguni Rainbow Indunas, Malangabi, Mapepela and Soloz.

There is also a third type of man—the man who comes to the field of war only to make a name for himself or to keep up a family tradition. Such a man was Malandela.

Malandela was a bitter man with a long family tradition of ferocity and courage to uphold. He also wanted to outshine his two rivals in the eyes of Celiwe, and he wished to recover the honour and respect he had lost on the day of his disgrace by distinguishing himself in the battle about to begin. Such a man tends to be impatient, and reckless; he can spoil carefully designed plans and prolong a battle.

* * * * *

In anticipation of this I called Nsongololo, Mavimbela, Malangabi and Mapepela aside and said: "Men, I want you to keep a close watch on Malandela. I have a strong feeling he might try to do something reckless tomorrow. I do not want him to be killed."

"Between you and me, Oh High Chief," grinned Malangabi wickedly, "I think it would be a good idea to let our friend Old Thundering Stomach get himself killed. Ever since he killed his brother and got himself disgraced his life has been hell. He has become moody, absent-minded and irritable. I think only death can cure his misery."

"Far be it from me to question your logic and decision, Great One, added Mavimbela, "but why must Malandela be exempt from the privilege of taking a chance on the battlefield, like the rest of us? Quite a few good sons of our women will be dead by midday tomorrow, and we might be among them."

"Listen men," I said, "none of you will be killed tomorrow—of that I can assure you here and now. You will survive tomorrow's battle to take part in monumental happenings in the very near future. But Malandela must also survive tomorrow's clash so that he too can take part in these happenings. They will be remembered by generations as yet unborn as the greatest happenings in the history of the Nguni, Mambo and Xhosa Tribes."

"Great One," said Mapepela, "is it true that you have lived for a thousand years and can see the future as clearly as we see today?"

"Yes, Mapepela, I have lived for more than a thousand years."

"I am sure that in the course of your long life you have loved quite a number of women," Malangabi put in with a wicked leer.

"About two hundred thousand," I replied nonchalantly.

"By my father's - - - - -," swore Mavimbela, "I really envy you, Oh High One."

"No, Mavimbela," said the wise Mapepela, "the Great Chief Lumukanda is more to be pitied than envied, I think. We human beings, we ordinary mortals, should thank the spirits for the fact that one day we shall die. We should be thankful that we are not immortal. Life is a futile, senseless thing. Death is not evil; it is the ultimate relief from the pain and dreariness of life. A mortal man can at least struggle hard in the course of life to win himself fame and renown one way or another, so that when he dies men will at least remember his name, which is the only victory that one can glean from the stark futility which is life. But what does an immortal gain from life? Nothing at all! Tribal wisdom says that all men should try hard to make their names famous for long after they are dead. I would rather lead a brief life and leave a name behind, than an endless one in lonely obscurity."

"Three curses on your thick head, Mapepela," growled Mavimbela. "Do you have to be so free with your opinions in the presence of my respected Chief?"

"Do not be angry with Mapepela," I said with a smile. "Every word he has said is true. He is a very, very wise man."

"Strangely, Wise One," growled Mavimbela, "I am forced to agree with what Mapepela says. Give me a short and sweet life, an honourable death, and a name men will remember."

"The only thing for which people will remember you, is your foul tongue," said Malangabi. "Never have I come across a man with a tongue as rotten as yours."

"You must get married, Mavimbela," said Nsongololo. "Perhaps a wife, or a nice pair of wives would help to cleanse your foul tongue."

"The day you see me married and wasting my blood in the stupid and ungrateful task of procreating children, will be the day when elephants grow wings. I loathe the things they call women, I detest them," Mavimbela responded.

"Why do you hate women, Mavimbela?" I asked. "Were you once hurt by one?"

"My mother must have planted an unfading flower of hatred for all women in my heart. She was the cruellest mother; she used to torture me and my two brothers while we were small children, Oh my Chief," said Mavimbela.

"She should have wrung your bull neck," said Malangabi. "Then the land would have been one foul-mouthed scoundrel less."

"I hear you have a wife, Malangabi," said Nsongololo. "They tell me you married that girl you were riding the great fish with, during the Peace Ceremony. Tell me, what made that beautiful creature choose a monstrosity like you?"

"She dreamt that an old man, who was her first ancestor, told her to marry me," said Malangabi. "And the very first thing she did on waking up was to weave a message mat telling me she loved me. I nearly fainted when I received the message."

We all laughed heartily at this and just then one of the warriors brought my supper—a whole boiled goat with yams, and I invited the Indunas to join me. As we ate, the voice of Malandela came faintly to us. Bitter, lonely, he was sitting all by himself with a three-string harp for company, and singing:

"Peace thee, Peace thee,
Oh my spirit—
Hold thy peace before the great Somandla . . ."

Even after I had wrapped myself in my great kaross and was waiting for the sweet embrace of sleep, even when all the camp fires had been extinguished and the only sounds heard were the crackling of twigs under the feet of the sentries and the roar of distant lions, Malandela still sat alone singing to the hum of his harp.

* * * * *

Dawn spreads itself over a land swathed in a thick blanket of crawling mist, blunting human vision to a distance of a few paces. Horns sound and the Mambo and Nguni regiments surge forward through the forests with savage war cries.

The attack is on. The attack is fully launched, and a young warrior named Gojela, the son of Mlomo, is scared. Every one of the more than six hundred warriors under the command of the scarred Battle Leader Malevu knew Gojela by the nickname of 'The Coward' and every one of those hardened veterans has made life unbearable for Gojela.

The pitiless, hard-bitten warriors have the habit of torturing Gojela. Their favourite method is to hold the thin, spindle-legged boy upside down over a very smoky fire . . . teaching him courage, as they call it, with loud roars of laughter.

Gojela is a coward and he cannot understand why. The very sight of a spear is enough to make his bowels open uncontrollably and a war cry leaves him paralysed with fear—with teeth clattering. Gojela has always dreamt of the day when he would rise and become a great Battle Leader, like Malevu, and the mighty Mapepela under whose command Gojela's buto falls. Often, in his few moments of peace Gojela has liked to imagine himself in the role of either of these two men, fighting bravely like them, killing many victims and bringing home trophies in the form of wounds from a victorious battle. Always when he has lain whimpering after having been cruelly teased or tortured by his fellow warriors, he has comforted himself by dreaming of the day when he would show them all that he too could be brave. He too could die bravely as all true warriors should. He has pictured the day when he will die a hero, praised and admired by all.

Last night, after a particularly nasty bout of torturing and gross teasing by the other warriors, Gojela had lost his temper and became angry for the first time in his life. With a flood of tears pouring down his cheeks, he had called them rotten bullies and told them he would show them all in the morning that he too, could be brave. Loud roars of contemptuous laughter had followed this tearful promise. Now, in the mist-wreathed morning, sneering warriors are urging Gojela to make good his boast. Gojela swallows hard. His brows are covered in sweat and his round fish-like eyes are glazed with fear. His legs are stiff with terror. His headdress has fallen off and is lying at his feet; his shoulders droop under the 'weight' of his shield and weapons and his teeth chatter.

"Come on, hero," roars one of the warriors. "Come on, we are attacking."

"Come on, you son of a rotten hyæna," bellows Malevu, prodding the boy cruelly with his spear. "Can't you see we are attacking?"

Gojela, urged by his inbred fear of men like Malevu, leaps high into the air, tosses his shield and weapons aside, and flees in blind panic—in the general direction of the enemy.

"Look! Look at him," roars Malevu. "Look at our hero; he is going to tackle them with his bare hands!"

Gojela runs, on and on—and right into the centre of a Luvijiti encampment. A score of the most ruthless looking foemen led by an awe-inspiring foreigner with a long flowing beard, long white robe and a spine-chilling curved sword, come charging straight at Gojela.

He turns and runs blindly away from such terrifying and very unfriendly looking men. He runs right into another band of yelling Luvijiti and they promptly surround him and hack at him with their mpangas.

"No! No, please don't kill me . . . No . . . Oh my mother . . . save me!" cries Gojela.

A huge Luvijiti aims a tremendous blow at Gojela's head. He ducks between the legs of the tall man, who falls back sprawling in the dust, with a curse. Gojela leaps away only to crash into another man who seizes him by the throat. Both go down and a savage struggle is in progress. Gojela finds himself astride the bigger man and he hits him again and again with his bare fists. Another man slashes at him with a mpanga. But he twists sideways and the tall man under him receives the full force of the blow; its owner loses his hold on the weapon—and Gojela seizes it.

Wildly, blindly, Gojela lashes out all round him—and three men go down. The Luvijiti close in, but in their wild frenzy they lash haphazardly and inflict more injuries on one another than on Gojela. A shield falls and he grabs it. He dances around, screaming, praying to his mother, pleading, treading around in a muddy puddle of blood, freely contributed by some twenty Luvijiti warriors now lying prostrate around him.

Gojela is still dancing, lashing, fighting blindly, insanely, and he is suddenly joined by another Nguni who charges forth from the mist, yelling at the top of his voice and carrying all before him. It is Malandela.

The attention of the Luvijiti is distracted by this newcomer. They try to re-form to face both. But their confusion is only increased. Gojela and Malandela are now fighting back to back, completely surrounded by maddened Luvijiti. Gojela adds ten more to his score, fifteen . . .

The mighty Nguni and Mambo regiments close in on the scene as the combined score of Gojela and Malandela reaches towards three score.

* * * * *

The Nguni and Mambo regiments closed in from all directions and a savage battle took place, lasting the best part of the morning. The Luvijiti were butchered to the last man—including the youngest son of the Munumutaba.

Gojela had seen his enemies melt away before the Nguni and Mambo warriors, and he had wondered why he was still alive. He observed the men he had killed, and he was not prepared to accept that it was his own handiwork. He retched at the sight of so much blood and death and slowly felt his senses evaporate from his body. He quietly sagged to the ground unconscious.

* * * * *

"Awake, hero!" The voice seems to come from a great distance. Wake up, the High Chief wants to see you."

Gojela opens his eyes and looks into the bloodshot eyes of his battle leader, Malevu, and he is surprised to find no mockery in them—only dawning respect and surprise.

"I did not know you had any courage in you, Gojela," says Malevu. "You and Old Thundering Stomach must have enjoyed yourselves before we came."

Gojela is half-led and half-carried to where Malandela and the rest of the Nguni commanders are sitting in the shade of the old marula tree, sheltering from the intense heat of the midday sun. As he comes face to face with Malandela his bewilderment weakens his legs. But Malandela catches him as he sags and, holding him erect, he plucks two ostrich feathers from his royal headband and places them on Gojela's head.

"Heroic son of Mlomo, I salute you, and I here and now appoint you one of my Rainbow Indunas," says Malandela. "I shall give you ten maidens for wives and a kraal of your own with fifty head of cattle. You are a brave, a very brave, man."

Gojela quietly sinks to the ground in peaceful oblivion.

* * * * *

Kokovula, the Great Witchdoctor, all his assistant witchdoctors and other numerous assistants are very busy. To him and his vast panel of assistants has fallen the most pathetic duty of all, that of saving the wounded and burying the dead. There are five hundred Nguni and Mambo wounded lined up for attention.

Groaning and writhing men are laid out in neat rows under the shade of the sacred mopani trees. Great pots of molten tree resin and pain-killing drugs are smoking and boiling away on fires a short distance away. Also in the fires are scores of metal axes, knives and hammers used for amputating limbs and cauterizing wounds. These instruments must only be used when red-hot. The High Laws forbid anyone to use either a surgical instrument or the poultices placed on wounds, unless these are red-hot. A pile of ornately carved ebony splints is close at hand, as is a great heap of soft hare skins, wild cat skins and even young impala skins, used for bandaging. On a bowl of clay is a pile of tsinga gut used for stitching open wounds and a grass basket stands next to this bowl; it is full of small copper clips used to clip stitched wounds firmly, in case the stitches loosen too soon afterwards.

Kokovula is quite used to the sight of human blood and pain. He has attended to the wounded on many a battlefield before. He is a cold, calculating and efficient man with nerves of iron and a heart of cold granite. He is occupied at his gruesome task with the casualness of a man weaving a grass basket. His two close assistants, Mandatane and Silwane, are nervous and scared by comparison, and Silwane has a small gourd of strong ilala palm beer in his hand to help steady his untrustworthy nerves.

Kokovulu draws with a piece of charcoal the sign of life on the foreheads of his two immediate assistants and then all three men wash their hands and arms thoroughly in a bowl of ox urine which has been brought in a great leak-proof skin bag for this purpose. It is important that all witchdoctors have a bag full of it when going to a battlefield to tend to the wounded. Ox urine is considered, together with that of a woman, to have strong antiseptic powers.

After washing their hands in the urine, the witchdoctors rinse them in hot water and they are ready to begin their task. The first patient is a badly wounded man whose forearm had been all but slashed clean off in the middle, and who also had an ugly flesh wound in the left hip. This patient poses a challenge to the skill of the great Kokovula, the Nyasa. The problem is, which wound to attend to first. The prompt action of the Battle Leader to whose buto this warrior belonged, of putting a firm tourniquet around the severed forearm had saved the warrior from losing too much blood, and for this Kokovula is more than thankful. Prompt action is now needed if this man's life is to be saved.

"Mandatane, you see to the wound in this man's hip, while Silwane and I attend to his arm—and don't let us waste time!"

Mandatane knows what to do; he does not need to be told. From the leather pouch he procures a soft hare skin and this he uses for cleaning the gaping wound carefully, with warm water, and from a large claypot with a lid he takes a handful of cobwebs and stuffs it into the wound. The cobwebs absorb the blood and assist the clotting process; bleeding stops almost immediately. He takes a delicate bronze needle and a short length of gut and stitches the wound skilfully. There is no need for a copper clip—only a wooden spoonful of joye leaves boiled in ox urine to keep away infection. The poultice is placed over the wound and a soft cat skin is used to bandage it.

Meanwhile Kokovula and Silwane have also begun the delicate task of amputating the man's arm—a task which requires iron nerves and infinite skill. This is a task which few witchdoctors attempt. Even the best witchdoctor loses one out of every three cases.

Carefully Silwane lays the man's arm on the great ebony block used for amputating and Kokovula starts by cutting out four flaps of flesh above the wound towards the elbow. There is much blood, but Kokovula does not mind, though Silwane retches continuously. The bone has been reached and it shines pink in the sunlight. The red-hot knife cools and with a curse Kokovula demands another from one of the ten 'fire boys', who take turns in pumping the bellows. He brings the next knife at a run, holding it with a wet skin, and Kokovula seizes it by the wooden handle and, with a deft slash, severs the forearm at the elbow and tosses the knife back at the feet of the boy who brought it. Quickly he stitches the four flaps together, adding copper clips to help the gut. Then he calls for the tree resin which is promptly brought by two other boys. This specially prepared resin is moulded skilfully and firmly over the stump until it forms a huge ball. This resin helps to keep the wound clean and also accelerates the process of healing. One can only get this resin from the luwafa tree, which grows only in very hot places. Its wood is often used in carving very sacred masks.

So antiseptic is this resin that any wound is bound to heal, provided it is properly covered and any infection or pus is properly removed before it is applied. It causes an unpleasant itching, but a brave man finds it quite bearable. The warrior under treatment is bound to go with this ball of resin for a year or two before it can be melted off.

"Great Kokovula," says Silwane, "this man has not been unconscious all the time."

"I have seen you cut off my arm," says the brave warrior. "What are you going to do with it? Roast it for dinner?"

Kokovula smiles back at the warrior and says: "You are a very brave man!"

"Did you doubt it, you old butcher?" smiles the man weakly, still in a daze. "Just wait till I am well again."

Mandatane brings a bowl of lunjwe juice—a thick syrupy and pleasant-tasting potion prepared from a herb by this name, which brings almost immediate and pleasant unconsciousness to anyone drinking it in the right quantity. "Drink this, brave one," he says, putting it to the lips of the warrior.

Meanwhile the other lesser witchdoctors have also been busy with the wounded. To each witchdoctor is attached two learner witchdoctors. All the witchdoctors and apprentices are under the command of Kokovula, who only treats the most serious cases.

One fat warrior is making a thorough nuisance of himself and he is not even seriously wounded. This gross quivering nuisance has only an arrow buried deeply in his thigh. But judging by the way he is yelling and screaming he has a whole quiverful of barbed arrows in his fat belly. The poor young witchdoctor and his two apprentices who are attending to this fat coward have been kicked in the face and clawed viciously. In desperation the young witchdoctor calls loudly for Kokovula who comes running with a short, heavy club in his hand. One good blow sends the fretful nuisance into dreamland and Kokovula calls for a red-hot knife with which he promptly cuts the arrow from the man's thigh.

There is a strong smell of burning human flesh as the great Kokovula uses a red-hot hammer to cauterize the wound. The arrow itself is thrust in the charcoal till the metal tip is red-hot. Then it is plunged into cold water. As soon as the warrior regains consciousness, he must drink the water and hang the arrowhead around his neck with a string as a charm to protect him against being wounded by arrows in future.

Thus the hours pass while, with the smell of blood heavy in their nostrils and the cries and groans of the wounded loud in their ears, Kokovula and his team of witchdoctors labour to save lives. There have been some deaths, under operation, but many have been saved already who would certainly have died had they not received attention. Lesser ailments are casually treated; men with large bumps on their heads have these punctured and blood is drawn with suction horns—a favourite remedy with witchdoctors, called the lumeka.

The witchdoctors work with acrid smoke in their eyes. This smoke comes from the fires and also from the piles of burning ntelezi leaves, purposely burnt to give off clouds of billowing smelly smoke which drives away blow flies that might endeavour to reach the wounded men. All kinds of flies are an infernal nuisance and a foul menace to any witchdoctor trying to operate on a battlefield.

Spare 'fire boys' enjoy themselves in a circle around the clearing in which the wounded are laid out and attended. These boys are armed with slings and bows and arrows, and already they have killed some dozens of vultures.

* * * * *

While Kokovula and his team are saving lives, another detail—or rather a whole regiment—under the command of the Nguni Rainbow Induna Ziko, the singer, is occupied with burying the dead. Nguni and Mambo dead are given a 'Victor's Burial', which means they are buried in full battle regalia in a sitting position with the knees drawn up and all their weapons are interred with them. The Luvijiti are buried in what is called the 'Defeated One's' graves—large communal graves taking twenty men each, with bodies stripped and laid flat on their bellies across their shields.

Bodies of the enemy, of those known to have killed Nguni and Mambo warriors before they were killed themselves, are buried upside down with their legs protruding from the mound. Thus they mark the spot, so to speak, for hyænas and jackal to find them and drag them out. This is called the 'burial of the hated ones' and is often practised on executed wizards and murderers. Nguni and Mambo graves are arranged in a large circle and a battle axe is planted in the centre to mark the burial ground. This battle axe is planted with its edge facing the East as a salutation to the gods. The dead foreigners, the Arabi, are left unburied and all those Nguni and Mambo warriors who were killed as a result of cowardice are strung up in trees to attract the attention of vultures and hyænas first.

The burial takes the whole day and as the sun goes down the great singer Ziko, who is also a traveller and the only man in the whole land who can speak the languages of both the Lawu (Hottentots) and the Batwa (Bushmen), stands over the fresh graves and commences one of his famous songs: Brief is life's flickering flame.

The kneeling warriors look up at their tall handsome Rainbow Induna, sharply silhouetted against the flaming sunset sky, and they listen attentively to his rich manly voice.

Lo, in the scowling, icy Dark
Is lit a tiny flame;
It is a tiny flickering flame,
Which is a human life.
Lo, for only moments few
It doth illumine the dark,
And quick the chilly wind of Death
Sucketh its fuel away.

Life is but a lost caress,
A whisper in the dark;
Life is but a tiny flame,
That flickers and soon is gone.
Mighty tyrants briefly rule,
And suddenly they live no more;
Great empires grow and bloom
Blooming just to fade again.

You that walk Life's thorny path,
And still are young in years,
Remember Life's thread is short
And brief each fleeting year.
So make the most of each bright day
You see upon this earth;
Strive and bleed for but one end—
A victor's death, a victor's name.

Vain the life a fool doth lead,
Who leaves no name behind;
From Life's own stark deserted land,
I snatch this fragrant triumph—
That on the day I'm laid to rest,
Men shall salute my grave—
Do thou then likewise, Oh my son,
Do thou then likewise, Oh my child.

Leave on Life's flinty ancient sands,
Oh leave thy footprints firm and deep,
And plant on history's recent shore
The flower of thy name.
Thus men and beasts as yet unborn
Shall bow above your grave,
And greybeards of long years to come
Shall say with pride—there was a Man!

* * * * *

The last dead man had been laid to rest and the last wounded man of the Nguni and Mambo carefully attended to—and carried home on a strong wickerwork litter. The last enemy wounded had been caught and dispatched, with a deft blow from an axe.

Now it was time for the weary though jubilant regiments to go home. All the enemy weapons had been collected and ceremoniously urinated upon by every man from both tribes, before being handed over to regimental blacksmiths to be melted down into lumps. All this metal and other spoils were transported on the backs of the ten thousand head of cattle we captured from the Luvijiti, and which they had brought up for their food supplies.

We rested for two days and on the third day we set out towards Celiwe's kraal. We had rid ourselves of an invader, and now there remained the counter-attack.

THE TENDER, DEADLY SPEAR

WHILE we were busy hunting down the Luvijiti in the land of the Nguni, the Munumutaba was chuckling softly to himself. He had successfully diverted the bulk of the Nguni-Mambo armies far to the East and now he was ready to launch a savage, devastating attack on the thinly defended land of the Western Mambo.

He thought he would sweep through the land like wildfire. But he did not keep reckoning with a woman named Noliyanda. Noliyanda had foreseen the invasion long before it came and on her own initiative she mustered a small fleet of old fishing canoes and crocodile hunter's rafts. She manned all these with the two regiments left behind to defend the land. She had decided to meet the invaders on the Zambezi. Thus, when the black invasion barges and canoes of the Munumutaba nosed their way across the Zambezi one moonless night, they ran right into a storm of stones and arrows and fire spears hurled at them by the Mambo home defence fleet.

Twenty Luvijiti barges were sunk almost immediately and another ten set on fire. The rest limped back to their side of the river, badly mauled and defeated. It was rumoured that the gross Munumutaba burst into an earth-shaking rage when the news of this defeat reached him, and bellowed orders at his nine remaining sons, each of whom commanded a sixteen-thousand man regiment.

The result of these orders was that on the following morning a three-pronged attack was launched across the Zambezi, an attack which forced my Queen Noliyanda to retreat to the Mambo Great Kraal, fighting every step of the way.

During the ten following days, Luvijiti armies besieged the ten military kraals built across the land of the Mambo, and also the heavily fortified Royal Kraal Tulisizwe. Thinking that he had all the time in creation, the Munumutaba built a great camp around each of the besieged kraals, intending to starve them gradually into surrender. As he reclined amongst leopard skin pillows, the Munumutaba giggled softly to himself, enjoying visions of what he intended doing with the tall beautiful Queen of the Mambo, who was impudent enough to try and resist him—the mighty Munumutaba!

Every attack that the Munumutaba's sons launched against the incredibly fortified Great Kraal was repulsed with heavy losses to the attackers, and already four of the sons of the Munumutaba had been killed—by bronze-headed, red-feathered arrows shot with deadly accuracy by none other than my Queen Noliyanda herself. The Munumutaba sent a 'sacred messenger' to the besieged kraal during a lull in the fighting, with a long message demanding that Noliyanda surrender. The great Queen replied with a single, well-known and most insulting sign.

When the Munumutaba received this insulting message, he killed the messenger on the spot and ordered an all-out attack against the Great Kraal. There was an earth-shaking roar as the Luvijiti hurled themselves at the bristling stockades.

* * * * *

She is standing on the stockade; she is tall, wide-hipped, large-breasted and narrow-waisted. And she is beautiful in a way which is not of this earth—a way which astonishes all mortal men and brings fear into the hearts of all who see her. To the warriors crouching at her feet, ready to meet the rush of the Luvijiti multitudes with spear and arrow and slingstones, this unearthly giantess is more to be feared than the enemy hordes converging on the Great Kraal from all directions. They fear her because she is not an ordinary human being. She is shaped like one, but she does not belong to this world.

Men fear this synthetic creature; they are repelled by her. To them she is like a most beautiful ornate claypot full of vomit—a beautiful flower whose odour causes a fatal headache. The very fact that she was created out of the near-dead body of an executed woman, fills everyone with horror, fear and disgust, and the most pathetic thing is that Noliyanda is herself fully aware of this. She tries hard to ignore it; she tries hard to overcome the bitterness in her own soul and the maddening longing to be just an ordinary human being. Her voice is low and throaty as she says: "Here they come, men. Get ready and give them a hearty welcome!"

The warriors grip their weapons hard and wait tensely as the attack closes in. Arrows and spears tear the air around Noliyanda's head. But she is contemptuously indifferent to them. The very skies darken with hissing and whining arrows—and they take a frightening toll.

Soon loud screams rend the air as wounded and dying men writhe in the dust, some with arrows protruding from them like so many porcupine quills.

The Luvijiti hordes advance at a run, their bows twanging and their slings snapping viciously. Hundreds of men vanish into the ground as they step on to the cleverly covered man-traps dug in great quadruple circles around the kraal. There are loud shrieks of agony as dozens of men are impaled on the barbed stakes protruding from the bottom of the deep trenches.

"Now!" cries Noliyanda. "Now men, now!"

A hail of arrows erupts from the defenders behind the ten rings of stockades surrounding the kraal—a tempest of death that cuts down the yelling Luvijiti with only the first concerted volley. But volley follows volley of arrows, slingstones and spears, and multi-pointed heavy missiles also launched by slings. The Luvijiti attack falters. They withdraw and leave thousands of men lying wounded and dead in a huge circle around the kraal, and those within are sickened by the sight.

Slowly the Luvijiti withdraw farther back from that devouring scourge of airborne death, and the defenders intensify their efforts by projecting a last devastating hail of arrows at a steep elevation. This is more than the attackers can take; they turn and run in blind panic, helter-skelter, a pathetic sickening rout.

Noliyanda has won yet another victory. The Luvijiti stampede back to their great camp in spite of savage efforts on the part of the leaders to make them stand firm. Many of the leaders are trampled under foot, and the Munumutaba loses more of his sons. In fact, there are now only two left!

* * * * *

The Munumutaba ordered a three-day pause in hostilities in which to mourn the loss of his sons. The besieged kraals had a breathing space, and in this period interesting things happened. First the ugly woman Nunu accosted the pretty foreigner Lulama-Maneruana who had just come out of the new 'hut of the wounded' where my Queen Noliyanda and her witchdoctors, Hlabati and Madolo, were busy tending the wounded. Lulama-Maneruana had been helping Noliyanda and was red-eyed from lack of sleep. She was utterly exhausted and was on her way to her own hut to sleep, as Noliyanda had commanded her to do.

Lulama-Maneruana's pretty face was also lined with pain; the secret unmentionable disease from which she is suffering was becoming worse with each passing day. Already she had contemplated suicide, as the High Laws encourage, by setting fire to her hut in which she would then calmly lie down and await death.

This strange, shameful alien disease is called the 'bite of the Arabi' because the alien slave raiders brought it into the country of the Black Tribes. Only those women who had loved members of the Arabi, or who were ravished by Arabi suffering from this disgusting malady, could be infected, and they could pass it on to those with whom they associated afterwards. Lulama-Maneruana who had been an empress of Zima-Mbje before being deposed by the Munumutaba, had once slept with an Arabi suffering from this disease. For many years she had borne this secret malady with great fortitude. But now the end was in sight. She could bear it no more.

Maneruana had been bitterly annoyed when that hateful, soulless synthetic creature Noliyanda had discreetly asked her if she was unwell. She had fiercely and coldly lied to the infernal thing that she was healthy—quite healthy. The impudence of the infernal creature! The Great Lumukanda must be induced to destroy this soulless thing one day. Imagine a man like Lumukanda loving something he virtually manufactured with his own hands!

"My child," the rattling voice of the huge, incredibly ugly woman Nunu cut across Maneruana's angry thoughts, and caused the pretty woman to jerk up her bowed head, "I want . . . to talk to you . . ."

"What about, Nunu?" asked Maneruana irritably. "Speak quickly I am tired."

The half-witted Nunu was deeply disliked in the Mambo Royal Kraal. People loathed her for her ugliness and very close resemblance to an ape, not only in features, but also in behaviour. Nunu preferred to live in a hole in the ground and she was so much like an animal that, if given food in a bowl, she always emptied it in a shallow hole in the ground and then proceeded to eat it. She was always dirty and she always liked to wear an old mouldy skin. The only time when people had use for Nunu was when heavy corn-grinding was to be done, or a heavy stone or log needed lifting. Nunu was used to doing all this without a murmur. The men and the women in the Great Kraal hated Nunu with the same intensity as they hated and feared Noliyanda, and in this Maneruana was no exception.

"You hate me, do you not, Maneruana?" said Nunu softly—and something in that soft animal voice made Maneruana feel uneasy.

"I do not hate you, Nunu," stammered Maneruana. But I do not want you near me—that is all."

"Is it . . . is it because you consider me dirty?" asked Nunu with an ugly grin which was intended to be a smile. "You are not so clean yourself . . . with all that purulence in your loins."

Lulama-Maneruana gasped. She had never told Nunu about her secret malady. The only people who had been told about it were Malandela's former wives and they had sworn not to disclose her secret to anybody.

"How . . . how do you . . ."

"Does the name Lufiti-Ogo mean anything to you, my child?" asked Nunu softly.

"Lufiti-Ogo!" cried Maneruana. "Lufiti-Ogo! Do you mean you are . . ."

"Yes," smiled Nunu, "I am your old friend from the Underworld . . . the Ogo, my child."

"Why . . . why?" gasped the girl, "Why did you not tell me this before? Oh, why . . .?"

"I did not want Lumukanda and his wife Noliyanda to know who I am," Nunu replied. "Now my child the time has come for you and me to strike the final shattering blow at the Munumutaba and save the land from further bloodshed. Remember that I predicted you would strike the decisive blow, my fallen saviour? The time is now! Come."

The Ogo seized Maneruana around the waist and suddenly the girl's vision blurred and the kraal vanished. When things came into focus again Maneruana found herself somewhere in the depths of the forests near a small lake. The Ogo was nowhere to be seen but her voice came from somewhere close by: "I have made myself invisible, and I want you to do exactly what I say. Take off your skin skirt and necklace, and bathe in the water. Quickly!"

"How did I get here?"

"I carried you here, child," said the Ogo. "Now do as I say."

Lulama-Maneruana quickly took off her attire and got into the water. No sooner had she done so when two young men armed with bows and arrows burst through the forest on the other side of the lake and spotted her. They circled around the edge at a fast run to get at her. They were Luvijiti warriors. Maneruana's heart pounded wildly as she leapt out of the water onto the grass and fled with desperate fear into the depths of the forest. But the long-legged Mashonas were gaining on her and the leading one dived at her legs from behind and brought her down. She fought and struggled and screamed, but in vain. She was knocked unconscious with a fist and left lying in the grass while the two young men discussed what they were to do with her.

"We must take her to our camp and show her to our father," said the elder of the two.

"You are a fool, Shabasha—a great fool!" said the younger. "That fat hog we call our father will only sacrifice her to the gods, and for that she is far too beautiful."

"What shall we do with her then, Oh Shumba?" asked Shabasha.

"She is our woman. We can hide her in a cave, and have her any time we want her," the younger replied.

"But we are not allowed to sleep with women," cried Shabasha. "We are not yet initiated into manhood."

"Who needs to know?" asked Shumba contemptuously "There are only the two of us here and . . ."

"Yes, you are right, Oh my brother. She will be our secret woman. We don't have to tell anybody about her, and I know a cave close by where we can hide her."

But the woman had recovered consciousness quickly. She had been listening to this conversation with wide, horrified eyes and at length she whispered: "No, children . . . no!"

"You keep your mouth shut," grated Shumba.

Shabasha threw himself down beside her and drew her to him with savage trembling hands. Maneruana struggled fiercely, silently, to free herself from the young man's passion-deranged clutches. Shabasha struck her cruelly across the face—again and yet again. Dazed by the savage blows, Maneruana ceased struggling and lay still. 'So be it, you stupid young fools,' she thought angrily. 'If you want to infect yourselves then, do so with the greatest pleasure!'

* * * * *

Lulama-Maneruana smiles softly to herself as she sits alone in the dark interior of the cave. She feels a strong self-satisfaction at what she had done to Shabasha and Shumba. Soon the only two surviving sons of the Munumutaba will be wishing they had never been born. She smiles softly when she remembers that in the greatest adventure of her life in the Underworld, the Ogo had called her the fallen saviour. Yes she, Lulama-Maneruana, had at last succeeded in hitting back at the Munumutaba through his sons, using no other weapon than her beautiful though disease-wasted and pain-wracked body. Yes, the fallen saviour had struck the final blow at the hated invader—the tender deadly spear had stabbed twice and stabbed deeply. Soon the Munumutaba's hordes will be finally and shatteringly defeated and sent running back to their distant land like the dogs they are.

The stone the two young men had used to close the mouth of the cave is suddenly rolled aside and Nunu, the Ogo, stands in the sun-drenched entrance. "Come out, Oh my child, come out quickly."

Maneruana staggers to her feet and emerges from the cave. The Ogo says: "Child, I am now going to cure you of your terrible malady, as I promised you in the Underworld." She places both hands on Maneruana's hips and the girl feels a strange burning sensation tearing through her. Her hips seem to be on fire and she writhes and moans with pain. She has to endure this ordeal for quite a while, and at last the Ogo's voice says gently: "You are cured now, my brave child, although, you have been deprived forever of the powers of bearing children."

"I honour you, Great Ogo, though I don't deserve your mercy. I thank you from the very roots of my soul. But what do we do now?"

The Ogo smiled. "We shall now go back to the Royal Kraal and . . ."

"You will do nothing of the kind—you will come along with me!" says a harsh hollow voice behind them. They whirl around and lo! behind them stands that strange apparition—the Spirit of Nature. "You, Ogo, you will now kindly return with me to the Underworld."

"Never!" screams the Ogo. But the Spirit of Nature seizes her in his long grassy arms and both vanish from sight in a hiss of disturbed air.

Lulama-Maneruana was left alone in the forest, alone and utterly helpless. When she had recovered from the great shock and surprise at the sudden turn of events her first action had been to get as far away from the cave as possible. Shabasha and Shumba had said they would return at sunset to bring her food. For Maneruana to try and return to the Great Kraal on her own was no longer possible. She was cut off from the kraal by the beleaguering Luvijiti and even if she could have crept through their encampments unobserved, there was still the risk of falling into one of the many man-traps before she reached the kraal itself.

She decided, therefore, to keep walking towards the east, farther and farther away from the besieged kraals. For three whole days she journeyed eastwards towards the land of the Nguni. On the fourth day she was found by a band of Nguni cow thieves who had crossed the border into the land of the Western Mambo to steal some cattle. The thieves, led by Shungu, a hulking rascal with a big wart on the nose, found Maneruana lying near a stream, suffering from a serious fever.

She was half-conscious and delirious. But her shining bronze necklace and dull-red copper bracelets told the thieves what her status was.

"This is a woman from a Royal Kraal," rumbled Shungu. "We are bound by the High Laws to protect her with our lives if need be—thieves and cut-throats though we are."

His band of seven hundred hardened killers nodded in gruff agreement. Even thieves had to revere and respect the High Laws. These were not laid down by selfish and bloodthirsty tyrants for their own evil benefit; they were laid down by Wise Men in ancient times for the benefit of all tribes and they had long since been accepted by all tribes. These laws were a pleasure to obey, not a burden, because everyone, from the highest chief to the lowest footpad, knew and clearly understood that they were the roots, aye, the very lifeblood, of every tribe.

So Shungu and his band of incorrigible thieves and cut-throats took the helpless woman to their temporary camp where the gaunt, frightened girls who were Shungu's wives and concubines did their best to nurse her back to health. Slowly, ever so gradually, Lulama-Maneruana began to recover.

* * * * *

Meanwhile, in the great camp of the Luvijiti, other things were happening which were destined to live forever in song and in story throughout the lands of the tribes. The Munumutaba had withdrawn all his armies from around the ten Mambo military kraals he had been besieging, and concentrated them all round the Royal Kraal Tulisizwe, which he intended to crush and destroy finally, regardless of the cost to his armies.

The day for the final attack had come and the Munumutaba chuckled softly to himself as he sent one of his counsellors, Mpolo, to call his two sons Shumba and Shabasha who were to lead the attack. On the leopard skin mattress on which the Munumutaba was reclining like a great hippopotamus on a sandbank, there also sat a hard-eyed albino woman who formerly had been Muxakaza, Malandela's one-time First Queen, who had become possessed of an evil spirit during her strange journey through the Underworld. This woman was now the Munumutaba's wife, with the proud title of Nyabangerika, or High Empress. This woman had escaped just punishment from the land of the Nguni which she had ruled briefly and with great cruelty after outwitting Vamba Nyaloti and she had been ingratiating herself with the Luvijiti and their mad ruler by restoring to them the infamous Bronze Idol, the 'Eye of Odu', still intact within it.

Now Muxakaza was the proud, haughty and cruel spouse of the man she fondly imagined to be the strongest ruler under the sun, and the person who suffered most at her hands was, strangely enough, the Munumutaba's orphaned grand-daughter, the dusky deaf-mute Muwende-Lutanana, of whose great beauty Muxakaza was bitterly jealous.

Muxakaza was seated next to the Munumutaba, feeding him ripe wild figs and other fruit as if he were a child, pausing now and again to whisper intimately into the fat despot's ear, causing the depraved Munumutaba to explode into gusty raucous laughter. The girl Muwende-Lutanana crouched in a dark corner of the temporary hut, awaiting with mute resignation the next sign-language command from either Muxakaza or her heartless grandfather. Beside her lay Lumbilo, her famous pet cheetah, who watched his mute mistress with yellow and highly intelligent feline eyes.

Mpolo returned just as Muxakaza was holding a bronze bowl full of strong beer to the Munumutaba's ugly lips. Mpolo fearfully prostrated himself before his ruler, expecting to be killed any moment and terribly afraid of speaking what he had to say.

"Great Elephant, the young Royal Lions cannot come to your presence," said Mpolo shakily.

The Munumutaba choked and spluttered on the mouthful of beer he was about to swallow. He tore the bowl from Muxakaza's hand and hurled it with great accuracy at Mpolo's face. He snatched another bowl of sticky sour porridge and also threw it — straight and true. Mpolo fell flat on his back as the heavy clay bowl struck him full in the face, filling his nostrils, mouth and eyes with sour porridge. The Munumutaba, encouraged by giggles from Muxakaza, leapt up, seized Mpolo by the throat and hauled him to his feet.

"Why can't my sons come to me when I call them?" he demanded.

Mpolo's eyes bulged and his tongue lolled out. His dark-brown face became as black as ebony. He tried to speak but could not and, as the gross tyrant tightened his grip around Mpolo's throat, the poor counsellor's loinskin became very wet. The Munumutaba laughed cruelly and released his hold. Mpolo fell flat on his back once more.

"Speak, dog!" growled the Munumutaba. "Why can't my sons come to me?"

Mpolo opened his mouth to speak, but only a hoarse croak came out and, as he made another equally unsuccessful effort at answering his ruler's question, Mpolo received a back-handed blow right on the mouth from Muxakaza.

"That ought to encourage you, dog," hissed the Queen. "Answer!"

"They are most unwell, Oh Great Ones," screeched Mpolo when he found his voice at last. "They are unwell and are ashamed to come to your presence."

"What illness would make my sons ashamed to come when I call? Answer, dog!" bellowed the Great Munumutaba.

Mpolo swallowed hard, opened his big fish-like mouth once, and then promptly shut it. He then beat a strategic retreat towards the entrance of the hut, but the Munumutaba followed him and reached for his throat. "Answer, dog!"

"Great One," stammered Mpolo, "your sons are both suffering from a foreign and unclean disease."

The Munumutaba's eyes opened wide. His flabby face became a playground of different expressions—surprise, anger, and utter disbelief.

"What disease is it?" he demanded at length.

"The slave raiders' disease, Oh Great Elephant," whispered Mpolo.

"You are lying, Mpolo," growled the Munumutaba. "Tell me you are lying."

"Great One," moaned the counsellor, "I wish I were."

"Mpolo," said the Munumutaba in a low, terrible voice, "tell me you are joking."

"Believe me, I am not, Oh Great Elephant."

The Munumutaba stood still for a long time, huge fists clenched and sweat pouring down his fat many-chinned face. He bit his lower lip until blood flowed and tears burst in a torrent out of his eyes. "Mpolo," he said at last, "tell me, what have I done to the gods to deserve this? What awful sin have I committed before the Highest to be thus punished?"

"Great One," cried Mpolo, "I do not know."

"Call Lumbewe the Prophet," said the Munumutaba in a faltering voice. "Send for Lumbewe the Prophet."

The counsellor Mpolo bowed his head to the very ground and went outside, leaving the Munumutaba sobbing on his leopard skin mattress, with Muxakaza trying in vain to comfort him. Some time later Mpolo came back into the hut, followed by a thin, hollow-eyed, wild-looking man wearing tattered and mouldy impala skins and a headband of green leaves.

"Your soul is greatly troubled, Oh Munumutaba," cackled Lumbewe. "You who have the dread Eye of Odu in your possession and who should have used its awful powers for the benefit of your people, instead of your own selfish ends, have been overtaken by retribution at last. The gods are angry with you, Oh Munumutaba, because you have abused the powers they gave you. You have tried to make yourself into a god, and you have even had the impudence to force your subjects to pray to you—and offer human sacrifices to images of yourself."

"Today your evil deeds have overtaken you and your name has been stained with shame because of what has happened to your last two surviving sons. And here is another thing which has called forth the anger of the gods: you have taken as your wife an evil woman whose body is inhabited by the soul of a creature that caused the destruction of her race a million years ago. Her only intention now is to destroy you so that she can take over your subjects and lead also them to death and destruction. You are lost, Munumutaba, you might as well kill yourself."

"Get out of here!" bellowed the Munumutaba. "Get out of here, you cackling old spook!"

With a loud, cracked laugh Lumbewe quited the hut. Then the Munumutaba said to Mpolo: "Accompany me to the hut in which my sick sons are."

Without so much as a glance at Muxakaza, the Munumutaba took the Bronze Idol from its little shrine in the far corner of the hut and went outside. The tens of thousands of fierce Luvijiti warriors flung themselves flat on their faces and licked the dust as the Munumutaba went by, while the thousands of wives and concubines the Luvijiti had brought with them from their distant native land knelt and tore off tufts of their hair, flinging them at their dread god-king's feet in salutation as he strode heavily past.

But the Munumutaba seemed blind to all this. For once he was not smiling and waving his hand in indifferent blessing as had been his practice. For once the expression of fierce pride and arrogance have left his bloated features, being replaced by one of unimaginable agony and horror. His high priests, who tended fires on altars on which were burnt human sacrifices to himself, were quick to notice that something was wrong. Together with lesser army commanders and counsellors, they came forward in a crowd and followed their flesh-and-blood god at a discreet distance.

When he reached the hut in which Shumba and Shabasha were hiding, the Munumutaba paused and ordered all his priests, commanders and counsellors to stand in a circle surrounding it. He then drew Mpolo aside and whispered harshly into the ear of that terrified man: "Listen Mpolo, this is my last moment on earth and I command you to take charge of my armies and fight your way out of this land, back to Zima-Mbje. Take the female Muxakaza with you and make her your goddess-queen in my place. But first I want you to move all commoners, all ordinary warriors and their women as far away from this hut as possible. Now go."

Mpolo ran like a maddened impala to carry out his king's commands. By dark he had completed the task of moving people away from the vicinity of the hut and the men standing around it. Night fell. The smiling stars looked down upon the earth once more, and the brooding forests were lent a more sinister appearance by the coming of the darkness. In the depths of the forests jackals began to howl dismally and hyænas to laugh like drunken old women.

Inside the hut the Munumutaba rose slowly from the carved stool on which he had been sitting and listening to the ceaseless babbling of his two sons who had been shocked into madness at finding themselves afflicted by so horrible a disease.

"So," said the Munumutaba softly, "so this is the end . . . and the time has come for me to die. The thread of my life, which would have gone on forever, must be snapped off soon. Welcome death . . . welcome maiden from the Outer Darkness . . . welcome dark Virgin Death. My name has been stained with a shame so great that were I to live for a million years I would never wash it off. Neither would I be able to forget what happened to my sons were I to outlive the very stars, the very mountains, the very River of Time. A curse, a vile curse on this evil, senseless thing that some idiot misnamed Life! Of what use is life, whether it outlasts the Universe or whether it lasts but a mere heartbeat? It is still nothing but life—life with its few transient joys, but mostly heart-racking pains and soul-shattering sorrows. So, farewell life—I cast you away as easily as one casts away an old flea-infested loinskin. But, Munumutaba shall not die alone, neither shall he die an ordinary mortal's death. He shall die in a blaze of glory that men shall remember to the end of time. And he shall take all his servants and his last two sons with him."

The Munumutaba opened the Bronze Idol and took out the radiant stone called the Eye of Odu. For a few moments he looked at the heavy crystal shining brightly in his hands and shedding a dull yellow light all over him and on to the floor. He raised his hands above his head and focussed his mind on what he wanted the stone to do.

A pillar of searing, ravaging flame burst from the ground around the hut and consumed everything almost immediately, as though struck by a direct flash of lightning. The priests and servants standing around the hut were reduced to ashes. The dry grass and bush all round caught fire. A mighty pillar of flame rose and lit the countryside with the brightness of midday.

Soon the fire spread far and wide, fanned by a strong south-easterly wind. The Luvijiti hordes fled wildly from the advancing wall of tree-devouring flame, smothering heat and choking smoke. Driven by a natural fear of fire, wild beasts of all kinds burst from their sanctuary and fled side by side with the human horde—a stampede of a haphazard host of man and beast. Tall mopanis burst in flame like tufts of grass, and crashed to the ground, crushing mobs of falling and struggling animals and human beings. Panic-stricken elephants trampled men and beasts alike. Maddened rhinoceroses tore through the seething ocean of fleeing beasts and warriors. Crashing, dashing and falling, up and on, shoulder to shoulder, darted lion, wildebeest and impala, leopards with fear-glazed eyes, and baboons, kudu, eland and nyala.

The devouring wall of fire seemed to reach the very stars. It was the greatest forest fire of all time—the Muuota-Mkulu of song and legend. The fire raged westward across the lands of the Tribes for more than a hundred days.

* * * * *

From where she stood on the innermost stockade of the Western Mambo Royal Kraal, my first Royal Queen Noliyanda saw the fire rage over the land. And she saw the great tide of men, women and beasts fleeing past the kraal on either side—one continuous torrent of living creatures fleeing side by side, natural and mutual enmity forgotten in the face of the greater common enemy.

To the panic-stricken people within the Great Kraal Noliyanda shouted: "There is no need to abandon the kraal. The fire won't reach it, the clearing around the kraal is wide enough. You are quite safe, but prepare for sparks coming down on the huts . . ."

Some time later two shapely female figures were seen staggering towards the main gate of the Great Kraal from the direction of the fire and Noliyanda herself went down to open the gate. It was Muxakaza and the dead Munumu- taba's orphaned grand-daughter, the deaf mute Muwende-Lutanana, the beautiful. As the surprised Noliyanda was about to close the huge carved portals behind her midnight visitors, a lithe cheetah bounded in and frolicked around the two strangers. The mute girl snapped her fingers twice and the beast stopped its display of affection and stood, looking up at the girl with luminous, adoring eyes.

"I see you, Oh foreign ones," said Noliyanda throatily. "What brings you to the kraal of those you hate?"

"I see you, Oh Great Queen," the albino woman Muxakaza responded. "But I do not see us as enemies because the enmity between our nations has been wiped out by the death of my lord, the Munumutaba, and also by the fire you see roaring across the land. I, Muxakaza, the Empress of Luvijiti, greet you, Noliyanda, as a friend. And I have come to give you a peace offering—a gift which will bring you much joy, you and your lord, the Great Lumukanda."

"I do not think I want any gift from you, Oh Muxakaza," said Noliyanda. "Hands that are red with the blood of my husband's people can bring no gift to me."

Muxakaza knelt mockingly before Noliyanda and her eyes were alive with pure mockery as she said: "Great Noliyanda, it ill becomes a great queen like you to continue hating an enemy who has come to you with an offer of peace. The High Laws say that the hand that is offered in friendship must never be struck aside, and I have not yet heard that the Great Noliyanda is exempt from obedience to the High Laws."

"A truce to your mockery, Oh Muxakaza!" hissed Noliyanda angrily. "What is the gift you have come to make me?"

Muxakaza pushed the girl Muwende-Lutanana towards Noliyanda saying, "She is my gift to you, Oh Noliyanda."

"What am I supposed to do with her? I cannot take her to the love mat, can I?"

"The birds of rumour have sung in my ears, Oh Noliyanda," smiled the albino woman. "They have told me that although the Great Noliyanda is the most beautiful creature in all creation, she is as barren as a lump of granite and is even now looking for a woman who will be prepared to bear children for her, whom she could adopt as her own. And I have brought my dead husband's grand-daughter with me to present her to the Great Noliyanda so that the dearest wish in your most royal heart may be granted."

For a long time the tall Noliyanda stood as still and as silent as a mopani tree. Long-lashed eyes lowered, she glanced down at her heavy jutting breasts and sadly shook her head. Tears sprang from the fountains that were her deep-set, burning eyes and flowed freely down her high-boned cheeks. Her dark, full mouth trembled as she said very slowly, "I accept your gift, Oh Muxakaza. I desire nothing more on earth than to bear my husband just one, just one child. Alas, that is not possible. So I shall take this girl for my husband as his Second Queen and she shall bear children whom I shall know as my own. Thank you, Oh Muxakaza. I . . . I honour you."

The Great Noliyanda was blinded by the glare of the distant bush fire and by her own tears, so she did not see the expression of malevolent triumph that flickered for a few brief heartbeats over the brazenly beautiful features of Muxakaza. The immortal woman did not realise that her insane love of children had already plunged her, and the man she loved, into the cauldron of sorrow and disaster. The evil woman Muxakaza had struck a devastating blow at us and we were not to feel its effects until a year had gone by

"She is a virgin, the daughter of a great man who loved her mother for a short time long ago, and then left her to continue his travels," the albino woman was saying smoothly. "When she finally realised she was pregnant and that her lover was lost to her for ever, the mother of this child nearly went mad with grief. When the time came for her to bring forth her baby she was so weak she did not survive the strain and the pains of childbirth. But her offspring lived—and this is she, Muwende-Lutanana, the beautiful. Take her, Oh Great Noliyanda—she is my gift to you."

Queen Noliyanda drew the girl Muwende-Lutanana gently to her and smiled down at her sad, beautiful face. She then ordered the two puppet women, Nomeva and Muwaniwani, to take her into the Great Hut, bath her and give her some food.

Noliyanda turned to Muxakaza. "Tell me, what do you intend doing now?"

"I have ordered that all those of my people who survive the fire should make their way back to our boats on the Zambezi," said Muxakaza. "When they have assembled there, we shall cross the river and go back to our homeland."

"But you must first spend the night here and eat the corn cake of peace with me. Then in the morning I shall personally escort you to that place of embarkation."

"Your kindness overwhelms me, Oh Noliyanda."

The two queens made their way through the crowd of warriors and servants towards Noliyanda's hut. The distant fire shed an eerie red glow over everything. Inside the Queen's Hut Noliyanda washed Muxakaza's hands in warm water and both women sat down to eat. First they broke a huge corn cake into two pieces and from her piece each woman broke a smaller piece which she ate. The rest was broken into still smaller pieces and distributed among the women and warriors inside the hut. The two queens then toasted each other with copper bowls full of mukoyo beer before eating the deliciously cooked fowl set before them.

Mpolo the Counsellor was dying. He was lying helplessly on his back watching with pain-dimmed eyes as the fire swept nearer and nearer.

He saw mighty trees go crashing down to the ground. He felt the searing heat of the oncoming fire wall. He saw bushes explode into brilliant flame and he saw the rain of sparks and ashes that fell over everything, setting the long grass on fire and singeing the skins of the countless dead and dying men and animals around him, all trampled underfoot by the stampeding hordes and left behind in the path of the approaching inferno.

Muxakaza had stabbed Mpolo—to stop him from warning Noliyanda, as he had threatened to do, about the horrible trick Muxakaza was about to play on the man whom Mpolo knew as his father. Mpolo was determined to get up from where he was lying and warn Noliyanda before he died; slowly, painfully he raised himself on his elbow, gasping hoarsely for breath, slowly . . .

Mpolo sat up. He managed to rise to his feet. He actually took a few staggering steps away from the oncoming fire. But then he fell flat on his face. With a sob he struggled slowly to his feet once more and staggered on, clutching the streaming gaping wound in his chest with both hands. On he staggered, on . . .

"Got to warn them . . . Lumukanda . . . my father . . . never saw him. Got to . . . can't . . . can't let evil woman . . . do this . . . to father . . ."

He did not see the pain-maddened and smoke-blinded rhinoceros charging madly out of the flaming forest. The huge beast had been trapped under a great fallen tree, but had succeeded in freeing itself after a mighty struggle. Its hide was blistered and smoking; one ear was burnt and shrivelled and one eye had burst. The great horn above its nose was burning and smoking like the stump of a fire-devoured tree.

Blindly, madly, it bore down upon the struggling human being. It struck Mpolo with its burning horn full in the small of his back and sent him high into the air, and down into a clump of bushes that exploded into fire at the same time. The forelegs of the animal collapsed and it ploughed the ground with a shuddering grunt.

HAIL TO THEE, OH MAIE-GAWANA

THE Wise Ones of the Tribes have a saying that goes: "Inyoni yobubi ilizalele qede iqanda layo isheshe ibaleke." (The bird of evil lays its foul egg and quickly flies away.) This saying applies to an evil person who is always quick to leave the scene of his or her crime.

And Empress Muxakaza of Zima-Mbje was quick to leave the Great Kraal Tulisizwe early the next morning. She did not wait for Noliyanda to wake up and arrange an escort for her. She did not even bid Noliyanda goodbye. She left alone and unattended just before daybreak, armed with two short assegais and a woman's shield. She left at a brisk, half-running walk, not pausing until she was three-quarters of a day's journey away from Tulisizwe.

She was a triumphant woman who had done an evil deed and was now putting as much distance as possible between herself and the scene of her crime. Muxakaza was no longer Muxakaza. She was nothing but a shell in which dwelt a spirit of a woman who lived a million years ago—a woman more evil than the Spirit of Evil herself; a woman who revelled in committing the worst crimes. She had no conscience. She dedicated herself to evil. She had once more begun a career of wickedness beyond the wildest imagination. The Beastess had just struck the first blow in her new project and this was to be followed by worse acts of evil before she would finally be defeated.

* * * * *

In the Great Kraal Tulisizwe the Queen Noliyanda was preparing the deaf-mute Muwende-Lutanana for the ceremony of receiving the long cowrie-shell decorated skin skirt of a Royal Wife. Firstly the beautiful girl was handed over to three old women known as the Sacred Grandmothers of the Tribe. These women dwelt in a big hut in one of the military kraals and they were elected for the sole purpose of checking all the girls in the land of the Mambo as yet unmarried to see if they were still virgins. This was done once a year and was—and still is—one of the strictest laws among the Tribes.

It was also the duty of the Sacred Grandmothers to verify the virginity of any girl about to be married, whether she was to marry a commoner or a king.

In the hut of the Sacred Grandmothers, or the Three Hags as they were secretly though popularly called, a secret ritual was once again in progress. No man is ever allowed to be present, least of all the bridegroom, and few men know the details of the ritual. I am one of these few men, but the High Laws of the Tribes forbid me to divulge any details.

The young girl Muwende-Lutanana was proven a virgin beyond all doubt. She was tested most rigorously and was found to be a fertile and highly sexed girl—a woman of the first order, a woman capable of bearing children with the minimum of pain, difficulty and risk to her own life and that of the child. I repeat that I am forbidden to describe the tests by which all this was established. Suffice it to say that the whole programme took ten whole days and nights.

Muwende-Lutanana also went through the painful ritual of the 'opening of the gate of love' with mute fortitude and, on the fifteenth day she was released from the hut of the Three Hags where she had been confined without seeing daylight for the whole period. As a mark of their approval and blessing, the Three Hags presented her with the elaborate cowrie-shell fringed mutsha. This garment, called the Mutsha of Fertility, was given only to those girls who had passed all the strenuous tests of womanhood with honours.

The Three Hags also gave the girl lengthy advice in sign language and made her swear, by placing her hand on the withered right breast of each of them, to be good and faithful to her husband to the end of her days.

Then, on the evening of her Day of Release, Muwende-Lutanana was sent back to Tulisizwe with three young priestesses for company.

Noliyanda received her with great joy and made a great fuss over her, after which she told her to have a good night's rest in preparation for the Ceremony of Acceptance which was to be held early the following morning.

* * * * *

Dawn had not yet stained the eastern sky and the glittering star called the Ndonsakusa, the Bringer of Day, or the Morning Star, was high in the Eastern heavens. This star is also known as the Star of Purity, because of its pure, steady brightness, and the Tribal Wise Men tell us that all brides taken when this star rules the eastern sky are destined to be faithful and dutiful wives.

Noliyanda woke up with the birds which had started their morning worship of the coming dawn. She did not step into her long, black, calf-skin skirt as she used to do; she only tied the First Queen's mutsha—made of shining bronze and copper beads—round her broad hips, put on her copper necklaces and bracelets and broad copper headband, also her bronze earrings. Then the stangest female creature of all time left her hut to awaken the two zombies Nomeva and Muwaniwani. These went to arouse the other women in the kraal while she turned her attention to the gentle awakening of Muwende-Lutanana.

A little later a group of twelve women made their way down to the lake in the fire-devoured forest, Noliyanda leading. The red light of coming day was creeping up the heavens and the trees of the burnt-out forest stood etched against this background tint like gaunt, atrocious skeletons. The smell of the burnt veld was still strong in everyone's nostrils and the black ash of burnt grass and wood was ankle deep. The women hastened their steps because the coming ceremony must be performed before sunrise and while the Day Star still rules the eastern skies.

Quickly the Queen Noliyanda led the bride Muwende-Lutanana into the cold water and the rest of the women threw off their skin skirts and followed. They all stood in a circle, waist deep in water, around their queen and the bride from the south, waiting patiently for the ceremony to begin.

Noliyanda scooped water with her cupped hands and poured it over Lutanana's head, saying, "I now pronounce you the Second Wife of my lord and husband, Oh ebony flower of the South, and to me you shall be like a sister, a part of me. I shall laugh when you laugh; I shall sing sweet songs and pray for you. I shall weep when you weep and dance when you dance. They who hate you shall be my foes and they who love you shall be my friends. The fruits of your undefiled womb shall be known as though they are mine as well. I, Noliyanda the ageless, salute you, Oh Dark Flower from the South."

Then each woman, but not the two zombies, scooped up water and poured it over Muwende-Lutanana's head in turn, praising her and giving her a poetic nickname, such as 'Flower of Sunrise', 'Joy of the Immortal' and 'Daystar of Luvijiti' and so on. The brief ceremony was concluded by the singing of the Song of the Moon. The gentle voices of the women rang eerily across the black desolation in the spreading dawn:

Oh sacred orb, which through the starry sky
At fleeing Ma the Tree of Life let fly—
Shed o'er the world thy gentle silver light,
And make each being feel love's consuming might.

Inflame with love the lion's savage soul—
Make him forget to stalk the zebra foal;
And make him turn to where beneath the trees
His mate awaits; and there find sweet release
From pleasant anguish, Aye, command the warring king
To lay aside his deathful lance awhile
And seek his consort of the shining smile
And with her fight and win a sweeter war,
Where shield is kiss and assegai desire!

"Where shield is kiss and assegai desire . . ." The words were a whisper, a lost fragrant whisper in the charred forest long after the women had departed to return to the kraal. A lonely bird sat on the only remaining branch of a blackened tree and sang its joy to the rising sun.

Another day was born. Another day was sent like a lost mopani leaf on a stream down the savage cataracts of time.

* * * * *

There was laughter in the kraal of Tulisizwe. There was joy and happiness. There was singing and dancing—eating and drinking. The Mambo were celebrating the end of the war and the return of peace in the fire-ravaged land.

But there were also tears. There were many tears for those who died. There were thousands of homeless people whose kraal had been devoured by the fire. There were thousands of widows and orphans. Noliyanda had sent out one of her two regiments to collect all the orphans and widows in the land and to bring them to the Great Kraal. She was also distributing thousands of baskets of corn to the homeless and the starving.

In a long ceremony with much dancing and singing, Muwende-Lutanana was presented at long last with the skin skirt of a Royal Wife. The singing and dancing went on for three full days.

Noliyanda was the happiest woman in the world and the people were surprised to see their queen dancing and leaping amongst the revellers like any young girl.

* * * * *

Shungu the thief leader and his band of male and female incorrigibles met us just as we were crossing the border from the land of the Nguni into the land of the Western Mambo. Shungu handed Lulama-Maneruana over to me and would have gone back to his evil ways of stealing had I not threatened him with my biggest cooking pot. I actually forced him and his whole band into my service.

Lulama-Maneruana threw herself at my feet and told her story, concluding by urging us to make full haste for home. When we reached my Great Kraal two days later we were greeted by a large crowd of men and women led by Noliyanda. The triumphant Mambo armies which I had led into the land of the Nguni were received like the victors that they were. They marched into the Great Kraal, preceded by shrieking and dancing women who showered them with a storm of sacred cowrie shells to the accompaniment of reed flutes and the thunder of victory drums. Oxen were slaughtered and roasted whole over great fires for the Victory Feast to be held on the evening of the following day.

In the wild tempest of rejoicing that preceded and followed our entry into the Great Kraal, I found myself carried shoulder high by my ten Rainbow Indunas, I was festooned with garlands of flowers and thousands of strings of cowrie-shell necklaces. My Queen, my Noliyanda, led thousands of wildly dancing women each of whom carried a sacred broom with which she swept the clearing before the advancing and chanting warriors. Loud piercing kikizà cries tore the air to shreds as they exploded from countless female throats. The dust rose in clouds from under the feet of the twisting, shaking, leaping women and the sounds of happiness floated over the surrounding hills and plains.

The wild dancing went on into the depths of the silvery moonlit night—as did the singing, drinking and eating. At midnight huge clay bowls full of water, mixed with the bile from the slaughtered oxen, were placed in the centre of the kraal for the warriors to wash their hands in, to remove the ‘dirt of battle’ before retiring to their homes.

The High Laws of the Tribes forbid warriors to go to sleep with their wives on returning from battle and for this reason a Widows Regiment is formed before the victorious armies return. A Widows Regiment includes all women without husbands at the time—true widows, rejected ones and spinsters—and these are gathered for the sole purpose of accommodating married warriors on the first night of their return. For a warrior to sleep with a strange woman on such an occasion is said to remove the ‘darkness’ with which he becomes cursed when he kills men in battle. Under no circumstances must a man pollute his wife with his first fluid immediately on returning from the field of bloodshed because, if he does so, he will defile his own children as yet unborn—and their children’s children—with tendencies to become homicidal maniacs. Such is the law, and such the beliefs of the Tribes.

Thus, the woman who shared my love mat that night was not my favourite Noliyanda, but the mortal, vivacious Lulama-Maneruana. Just before we went to sleep Noliyanda came in and told me pleasantly that she had a surprise for me, the nature of which I would find out in the morning.

As my Queen, Noliyanda had chosen the beautiful foreigner Maneruana from a hundred women who had been clamouring for the honour of sharing the love mat with their High Chief. But Noliyanda had not given thought to the fact that Maneruana hated her bitterly and the greatest wish in this former queen's heart was that I should destroy Noliyanda—the Unnatural Creature as many called her. A man is forbidden by law to reject a woman whom his first wife has chosen for him, be it permanently or for one night only. I was thus powerless to change Maneruana for another woman, much as I wanted to.

Lulama-Maneruana—now generally known as the Fallen Saviour—loved me with an intensity that approached madness and she wanted badly, madly to become my First Queen in Noliyanda's place. She was a wilful, dangerous woman who knew what she wanted in life and stopped at nothing to get it. As she came proudly and fearlessly into my Great Hut, her thoughts—her secret unspoken thoughts were as loud in my ears as if she had spoken them at the top of her voice: "At last, my adorable and mighty god, I have you—even though it will be for only this short night. Would to the Ultimate Cause it were for the rest of my life! I love you Lumukanda . . . I desire you with every vein in my body . . . every cord and fibre of my being! You shall be mine, Lost Immortal, you shall be mine even if I have to wait till the very stars fall from their lofty thrones. You will be mine even if I have to kill and poison every woman upon this earth to get you."

"Someone," I said with a smile, "someone is thinking in violent and red-hot directions."

She was startled. She had forgotten that I could read human thoughts. I sensed her hand going to her mouth and I heard her gasp of surprise and fear.

"I do not want you, Oh Maneruana," I told her gently. "You must remember that you are one of Malandela's wives and you have not gone through the Rites of Separation with him so that you may marry again."

"My lord and Chief," she said coldly, "whether or not you desire me makes no difference to me. I love you and that is all that matters. And I mean to have you or die trying. I am Maneruana, the rightful chieftainess of Zima-Mbje, and what I want, I get. Even if I have to go out and kill every woman in the world, my mind is made up that I shall have you."

"You talk like a fool, Oh Maneruana," I said calmly. "I have met many women like you in my life and your drivelling does not impress me. To me you are but a man-hungry harlot, nothing more."

"You shall have reason to regret those words one day, Oh Great Lumukanda," she said angrily. "The day shall come when you shall crawl to me with your tail between your legs, you arrogant, heartless beast!"

"Sit down, Maneruana. A truce to your childish bleating and squawking. You are here to do my bidding, so shut your dirty little mouth, you strumpet!"

"Ha!" laughed she. "Insults are spears that hurt only the foolish. Insult me as much as you wish. But in the end—one day—you shall be calling me your beloved one."

"That day shall never dawn, Oh Maneruana," I said, smiling. "Come here, Oh mad one—you shall have your wish, but for this one night only."

In the course of my life I have met and loved thousands of women. But, believe me, Lulama-Maneruana was one of the best, of the very best, as I discovered that night.

She was a pliant sapling, tossed by the raging tempest of emotion and desire. She was a bolt of searing lightning, vibrant with passion. Yea-ha, she was a red-hot spear, heated in the furnace of love. There was something frightening in her wild unabashed caressing, her lip-bruising kisses and her lacerating clutches. Lulama-Maneruana—the Fallen Saviour—was second only to Noliyanda, in what the Wise Ones of the Tribes call 'True Womanhood'.

But somehow I did not dream of making her my wife. To me she was but one of the thousands of women whom I had loved once and forgotten. She was but one of the many flowers I have plucked, admired, and cast aside—flowers that grew in their thousands along the footpath of my life.

"That," I said at long last to the thoroughly spent female, "ought to cure you of your stupid infatuation."

Her closed eyes opened slowly and her eyelashes fluttered. "Aie-kona, great Lumukanda," she whispered, "nothing will ever cure me of my love for you. And this has made me love you all the more. And I am prepared to walk into the Furnace of Eternity itself if by so doing you will turn out to be mine."

* * * * *

In the morning Noliyanda came into the Great Hut with her handmaidens, the two zombies, and greeted me by first kissing my forehead, hands and feet, and then saying pleasantly, "My Lord, I shall now present to you the young mortal woman I have chosen to be your Second Queen and I beg you to accept her and love and cherish her for my sake. She is the one I have chosen to bear you the children I am unable to bear. She is a proven virgin and Muwende-Lutanana is her name."

"I accept your gift to me, Oh Noliyanda, joy of my sightless eyes, and I do hope she is a beautiful one."

"She is as beautiful as midsummer dew, my Lord, and unlike me she is both young and fresh . . . and pure."

"No creature under the stars could ever be as beautiful and as pure as you, Oh immortal sun of my life. And it is for your sake only that I accept the young woman. Bring her in and let her see her lord and husband."

Twenty women, including my two daughters, Luanaledi and Mbaliyamswira, crawled into the hut at a signal from Noliyanda, accompanying the young bride Muwende-Lutanana.

"My Lord—your bride," said Noliyanda throatily.

I was suddenly aware of tension mounting inside the hut and I wished to the stars I could see what was going on. I sensed Lulama-Maneruana, who had not left my side since sunrise, stiffen beside me. I heard her gasp with horror. Then I heard Luanaledi's delightful voice saying, "It seems as if Lulama-Maneruana and Muwende-Lutanana know each other from somewhere, Oh my stepmother."

"They are looking at one another as if they are each seeing an evil ghost, Oh Luanaledi," laughed Noliyanda. "Tell me, Maneruana, are you and Lutanana acquainted?"

Lulama-Maneruana ignored Noliyanda's question. Instead, she rose and flung herself at my feet shrieking, "Great Lumukanda . . . my Lord, Great Immortal One, you . . . you cannot marry this girl!"

"Why, Maneruana?" I asked, feeling uneasy. "Why can I not marry this girl?"

Noliyanda's voice rang out suddenly, coldly: "My Lord, disregard this woman's raving. She is jealous of Lutanana, that is all. And she hates me bitterly as you know. All she wants is to spoil your new bride's happiness. I want a child-bearing female for my husband, Maneruana, not a creature like you who is as sterile as I am and has many other faults besides!"

Believe me, Lumukanda," shrilled Maneruana, "believe me, I beg you. You cannot marry Muwende-Lutanana."

"Rainbow Indunas Mavimbela and Nsongololo," called out Noliyanda, "come in here and get this mad woman out! I am sick of her jealousy and I do not want to see her face again."

"Shall I kill her, Great Queen?" bellowed Mavimbela, the woman hater, as he crawled into the hut.

"No," replied Noliyanda coldly, "give her food and tell her to go away from here and never come back. Take a company of warriors and escort her far away from this kraal and tell her to keep on travelling. Quickly now!"

Mavimbela hauled the sobbing Lulama-Maneruana to her feet and dragged her roughly away.

"My Lord," sobbed Maneruana, clinging briefly to the doorway, "my Lord Lumukanda . . . my beloved one, you shall regret having accepted this girl as your bride. That evil, unnatural monstrosity you created—that slut Noliyanda—is plunging you into the whirlpool of sorrow, shame and suffering . . ."

"Come, you dirty harlot!" snarled Mavimbela.

* * * * *

I accepted the young girl Muwende-Lutanana as my bride. But Maneruana's words had filled me with uneasiness and dark foreboding. Something was wrong somewhere and for once in my life I did not know what. And, to my great surprise, I could foresee great trouble in the very near future for myself—trouble springing forth from my having accepted Lutanana as my Second Queen.

Thus, when Lutanana came into my hut that night I turned my back on her and began thinking of ways of getting rid of her—somehow. When I read her thoughts in an effort at finding out the true nature of the trouble that she was going to bring me, I found she was nothing but a simple girl who had never known her father and whose mother had died when she was born. I also discovered why she had been so shocked at seeing Maneruana sitting next to me. Maneruana had ill-treated the girl somehow, long ago while she was still queen of the Luvijiti, before her brother, the now dead Munumutaba, overthrew her. I also realised that Lutanana loved me and was beginning to feel heartbroken and insulted as a result of my ignoring her.

One moon went by and at the beginning of the second winter moon Muwende-Lutanana did a strange and unprecedented thing. First she tried to kill herself with a spear while she was alone in her hut. Fortunately my daughter Luanaledi happened to enter at that moment and was just in time to tear the spear from the deaf-mute women's hands. Then Lutanana sought out Rainbow Indunas Nsongololo and Ntombela and bitterly complained to them in sign language about my continued coolness towards her, and concluded by demanding that the Indunas should ask me the reason for my insulting behaviour.

They came to me as I reclined on a lion skin under the cool roof of the canopy hut, known as the 'day shelter', a large grass roof supported by eight wooden posts. They knelt at a safe distance from me and started beating about the proverbial bush for a long time, asking me a lot of questions about my health and Noliyanda's. They even wanted to know if all my one hundred favourite dogs were healthy and if I slept well the night before. They were summoning enough courage to ask me the question they had been told to ask—and they hesitated again and yet again. I could not help smiling softly to myself because I had already read their thoughts and found out the true reason for their having come to me. At long last the fat Ntombela cleared his throat and said slowly:

"Great One, a little sparrow has complained to two dogs — two of your dogs with two feet . . ."

"Oh!" I responded. "And what did the sparrow say to the dogs?"

"The little sparrow sat on a branch and called the dogs to her," said Ntombela. "And when the dogs came under the tree the sparrow asked them to go to the great vulture and ask him why he was ignoring her. She also told the dogs to tell the great vulture that if he does not love her, and has no intention of making her his own, he must please say so."

"And," added Nsongololo, "the little sparrow says unless the great vulture respects her rights of wedlock, she shall complain to the great hen-vulture, who chose her to be the second mate to the great vulture."

"And," Ntombela put in again, with a nervous laugh, "the little sparrow is of the opinion that the great vulture has become, er, well . . ."

"She does, does she!" I bellowed, sitting up with a jerk. "The two dogs must go back to the little sparrow and tell her that the great vulture would like to see her in his Great Hut right away."

The two Rainbow Indunas left with wide grins on their faces. When I entered my hut some time later I found Muwende-Lutanana there alone. And very soon she had good reason to regret having insulted me by telling tales to my headmen.

* * * * *

The moons sped by and it was not long before the song of summer was again in the air. From the ashes of the burnt forests new and brighter trees were rearing their young heads proudly—growing, slowly growing.

In many places the wild beasts were returning and the roar of lions and the howling of jackals tore the nights asunder once more.

The cornfields and yam plantations were the purest green and loud was the singing of women and maidens as they hoed the fields. The days were lovely and cool and the nights were either cloudless or cloud-packed and torn by hail and lightning. It was on one of these clear lovely days that Noliyanda came into my hut and said tiredly:

"It is as said, Oh my Lord, the young woman Muwende-Lutanana has three lively young in her womb, and the time for her deliverance has come; it is today. But she is in difficult labour and might not survive."

There was tension in the Great Kraal Tulisizwe. There was tension mingled with great excitement and expectancy. The bird of rumour had already flown around the great kraal and everybody knew that at long last, after many months of speculation, something was about to happen, for better or for worse, to a young Royal Wife with the foreign name of Muwende-Lutanana.

For her the greatest and the most dangerous moment of any young woman's life had come and her life was definitely in danger. For a young woman who had never given birth to a child before, the birth of triplets trebles the pain, fear and hazards.

At long last Noliyanda came into my hut again and said with a sigh: "My Lord, the brave young woman Muwende-Lutanana has given birth to three healthy baby boys, and two of them are blessed ones."

Blessed ones! Oh rare occurrence on a rare event. Blessed ones! For a woman to give birth to triplets is a rare enough event in the land of the Tribes. But for two of these to be Blessed Ones is rarer still! Such children, born with a caul covering the head, are destined to become wise and famous in the land. The Laws of the Tribes require that such children should be treated with special care. They should be trained to become Wise Men, or witchdoctors even; and they should be cared for, not spoilt, in the course of their growing up like rare plants that they are. Immediately after birth such children should be given an ivory spoonful of the fluid from the caul that had covered their heads, and the caul must be dried and included in the *gri-gri charm that such a child must wear around the neck for the rest of his life.

"This is indeed a great happening, Oh Noliyanda," I said, genuinely moved. "Have you seen to it that the requirements of the High Laws are being carried out with regard to these two children?"

"Yes, my Lord, the Blessed Ones have been given that which they must drink and I have sent the puppet woman Muwaniwani to the river to find a smooth white pebble for the third child."†

"This means that preparations will have to be made for the journey to Maiegawana," I said. "Go, my wife, and bid Nsongololo find a young white goat with black ears."

"As you command, my Lord," she said and promptly left.

Maiegawana, the 'mother of children', was a great rock far away across the Zambezi where little babies of all tribes were buried. Babies who died at birth, one of twins destroyed according to the law, premature babies, all were buried at the foot of this towering rock. People travelled for days on end, carrying tiny litters on which lay their dead young, to Maiegawana, the ageless rock. The legends say that this rock was once a beautiful woman who had turned into stone when she saw the Sun Dragon devour all her children. It was also said that all little ones buried under the presence of the great cone of solid granite turned into stars that brought hope to the hearts of all those in distress who read them on clear nights. Yes, strange indeed are the beliefs of the Tribes.

A gri-gri is a tiny roll of calf skin containing the dried navel string of the wearer.

†The law requires that if a woman gives birth to twins one twin must be destroyed by having a round pebble pushed down its throat. But if she gives birth to three children, one must die and two must live.

* * * * *

We took half a regiment of warriors and crossed the Zambezi in fifty large canoes. On the other bank we left a company to guard the canoes while we made the long journey south-west to Maiegawana on foot.

On the well-worn trail to the great rock we met many people from different tribes returning to their homelands. We even saw two skeletons of a young couple who had been so heartbroken at the loss of their child that they had killed themselves with a spear on the way.

Two days later we reached Maiegawana and the two old half-witted gravediggers, who had their home near the great rock, met us with heavy digging sticks and hoes in their hands. To these lonely, but very rich old men we gave the red cow we had brought with us, and they began digging the round little grave at the foot of the mighty rock. Noliyanda and I brought the little litter with a tiny bundle of leopard skin inside it to the grave side, walking backwards as custom dictates, and Tondo, the elder of the two gravediggers, took the bundle and put it gently into the grave. "Rest now, little one," he said tenderly. "You shall be playing amongst the stars soon."

The other gravedigger dragged a portable stone altar towards us as Tondo rapidly filled the grave, and lit a fire of dry twigs on it. Tondo then took the goat we had brought with us and trussed its legs together before laying it on the altar. The two old men lifted it on to the fire and then waved us away "Go now, and peace go with you."

We left just as the sun was setting and the sky was a blaze of blue, red, yellow and purple. Sharply silhouetted against the burning sky the mighty rock Maiegawana reared its bulk above the flat-topped trees. Maiegawana the ageless, Maiegawana the eternal rock which has seen more woe and more grief than any other single rock in the land.

Hail, hail, and farewell, Oh Maiegawana!

A WOMAN'S REVENGE

THE year fled by on the wings of sunset and another year winged its silent way towards the waiting earth. The two little boys, to whom I had given the names of Demane and Demazana, grew up like green corn plants in a fertile field. Although I could not see the chubby little things, I could feel and sense exactly what lovely babies they were. Everybody wanted to hold them, and once or twice I had to be firm with childless women who tried to steal the little piccanins, now crawling all over the place, bawling and very often fighting fiercely with one another over the hundreds of ebony toys that children from all over the land had showered on them. Noliyanda was beside herself with joy, and now most of her time was spent in bathing, handling and anointing with hippo oil Lutanana's chubby little mischiefs as if they were her own.

Then came the day of the 'Sun-baby Ceremony' which must be held when the baby begins to walk. With this ceremony the little Sun-god Shati is called upon to bless the child and to make him strong and unafraid.

The Sun-baby Ceremony of Demane and Demazana was unique because everything had to be in triplicate. The land had been combed for three cows exactly identical in colouring, age and general form. The cows we eventually found were red with white bellies and white faces and all three had horns that grew in a perfect moon crescent. Every vessel, every pot to be used in this ceremony had to be in triplicate. Nothing was to be used individually.

The result was that each guest found himself eating the same food at the same instant from three identical bowls and the law prescribed that everybody must eat exactly the same amount from each bowl.

Although the third child of the triplets had been killed according to the law, he was never to be referred to as dead, for as long as the other two were alive. He was always to be referred to as living—albeit in spirit—and whenever anybody wanted to give gifts to the boys he had to give three, not two. For the rest of their earthly lives the two boys were to refer to themselves as 'the three of us', and whenever food was dished out there had to be three dishes.

To our great surprise, very few people answered our invitation to the ceremony, and many of those who did had an uneasy look about them which made Noliyanda wonder what could be the matter. My adopted son Mukombe told me a rumour he had heard that daily many people were secretly leaving the land of the Mambo and trekking to the land of the Nguni. Mukombe, who was an overseer of the boys who watched my vast herds of cattle and who had thus to make frequent trips overland to find new grazing lands, added that confirmation of the truth behind this rumour was to be found in the fact that about twenty large kraals he and his fellow herdboys had passed on several occasions were standing empty.

In spite of the few hundred guests and the atmosphere of uneasiness that hung over everything, the Sun-baby Ceremony was a great success. The warriors danced wildly and ate, drank and laughed lustily, as did some of the guests, both male and female.

When the time came for the little boys to come out—daubed all over their fat little bodies with broad black and white stripes of soot and white clay, and wearing most unwillingly light round calf-skin masks with a stiff grass fringe all round, the people roared with laughter and toasted the squalling urchins from bowls of beer, solemnly calling upon the Sun-god to look upon and bless the two little infants.

* * * * *

Two days later the Rainbow Indunas Nsongololo, Mavimbela, Ntombela and Shungu came into my hut—armed to the teeth.

Their souls radiated murderous anger and Mavimbela was weeping openly and without shame as he laid down his spears and crawled close to me. He laid both his calloused hands on my right foot. "Great One, Great Lumukanda, we have a request to make to you. We, your loyal servants humbly request to be permitted to kill an evil and black-hearted pest here—here before you."

"You four war leopards seem a little angry," I said with a smile. "And who is the pest you ask my permission to kill?"

"Great One," replied Ntombela angrily, "this is not the moment to joke and we are in no mood for laughing. In spite of your many faults, you have been a great and good Chief to us, and I, together with these three brave colleagues, regard you as a father. We should willingly lay our lives down if you tell us to—here and now. You know our loyalty to you, and our love for you, Oh Great One. Now, an evil woman has been going around from kraal to kraal for these past two years and spreading evil stories about you among the people. She has been telling the people that you are an evil demon and a wizard, and that you have . . . have . . ."

"Have what, Ntombela?" I asked. "And who is this evil woman?"

"She says, Great One, you . . ." stammered Ntombela. His voice trailed away in a low moan and he refused to say another word.

Just then Noliyanda came into the hut, her soul radiating surprise. "What have you men got in that big grain basket you have outside the hut?"

"An evil pest, Great One," said Mavimbela with a grim smile, "the queen of all the skunks and the polecats in the world."

"Mavimbela," said Noliyanda sternly, "there is a woman in that closed basket out there and I can hear her thoughts. Take her out! Who is she?"

Nsongololo and Shungu brought the basket inside the hut and there was a loud scream as its contents were unceremoniously emptied on the floor.

"You!" cried Noliyanda. "You!"

"Who is it?" I asked.

"It is that dirty harlot who used her body to destroy the Munumutaba's sons," hissed Nsongololo, "Lulama-Maneruana."

"Now," growled Mavimbela, "let me hear you talk before we kill you. Open your rotten mouth and let the tokoloshe within you tell our chief what you have been telling the people about him."

"Five hundred thousand people have left this land as a result of this woman's malignant prattling," roared Nsongololo. "There are now less than that number of people left in the land of the Western Mambo. She has caused the Mambo to scatter and to leave their country. This pest has destroyed our tribe. Beat her."

There came the dull thud of a blow—another and yet another. A storm of savage blows, punctuated by loud yelps of pain, was followed by the dull thud of a falling body. There followed yet sounds of kicks and further loud screams.

"Stop it!" I cried. "Stop it . . . let me hear what this is all about."

"Speak, you filth!" cried Navimbela. "Tell our chief what you told the people about him."

"Forgive me," sobbed Maneruana. "Do not hit me again . . . please . . ."

"Speak woman!"

Lulama-Maneruana sobbed out her story, encouraged by occasional blows from the Rainbow Indunas: "I had tried to tell you the story, Oh Great One . . . to warn you in time. But I was not given the opportunity. When I was still the chieftainess of Zima-Mbje, the daughter of my brother quarrelled with her father and left the land of the Luvijiti with a band of her followers and fled into the land of the Lunda to the north-west. A year later she returned and told us she had met a man with whom she lived and after six months she was carrying his child. But he left her. She was half mad with grief and on her return to us she died a few days after giving birth to the child . . . a girl. I brought up this girl, a normal child, capable of speech and hearing—Muwende-Lutanana. She grew up as my slave and servant.

"Then one day I was told that the girl was among those who, together with her grandfather, were plotting against me. I had her seized and taken to the fortress of Zima-Mbje to be publicly tortured as an example and a warning to the other plotters. A hot poison was poured into her ears, forever destroying her ability to hear, and she was forced to drink some of this poison, with the result that she nearly died and forever lost her voice. A few months later her grandfather, my brother, led a popular revolt against me and my followers, and I had to flee in defeat. My brother took over the vacant throne and assumed the title of Munumutaba the Fifth. When I saw the girl on the day Noliyanda presented her to you, Oh Lumukanda, as your Second Wife, I was shocked. Although neither you nor she knew it, I knew that you are her father. And Muxakaza brought her to you as an instrument of revenge!"

"But why did you have to go about the country telling all the people about this?" demanded Shungu. "Why did you not warn the Chief first?"

"I tried!" shrieked Maneruana. "I tried hard, believe me, but no one bothered to listen to me. Noliyanda had me thrown out of the kraal like a dog. And that broke my heart."

Mavimbela drew back his arm and sent the woman flying with a blow in the stomach. She fell at my feet and lay still for a few moments. Then she stirred and sat up. "Forgive me, Oh Lumukanda," she gasped. "I deserve everything done to me. Love makes a woman mad and being scorned makes her even more so. I thought that while I had been given no opportunity to speak, I might tell others so that they may find an opportunity to bring my warning home to you."

"Your spreading this terrible thing among the people has caused them to flee the land, because they think that the chief married the young woman Lutanana knowing she is his own daughter, and they believe that a great curse will fall over their homeland as a result," said Ntombela coldly. "You may not have anything to do or say now, strumpet, but we know what to do. You shall die, Maneruana."

"No, no!" I said in a voice I no longer recognized as my own. "No, there shall be no killing. Let Maneruana go free."

Noliyanda began to weep, sobbing louder and louder until she was wailing at the top of her voice. She flung herself about on the mud floor of the hut. "I caused all this, I was the one who caused all this," she wailed over and over again.

Night fell and Muwende-Lutanana and my two daughters, Luanaledi and Mbaliyamswira, returned with the other women of the kraal from hoeing the cornfields. Noliyanda bade the Indunas not to tell anybody else what had happened, at least not until the whole problem had been given a lot of thought. Maneruana was confined in one of the huts and it was not long before I found myself alone in my own hut.

I took my long ebony staff, flung my leopard-skin kaross over my shoulder, and silently left the night-veiled kraal.

I did not know where I was going and I did not care. I walked and walked. The birds sang in the trees as dawn broke. The day wore on to sunset and another dawn crept upon me. The days fled by, the frowning nights passed, never to return. I neither ate nor drank, and I was walking in no specific direction.

Eventually, one storm-wracked night, with ravening bolts of lightning tearing down tall trees and peals of thunder shaking the earth I stumbled and fell—and I entered a yawning chasm.

"Lost and Fallen Immortal!"

"Lost and fallen in more ways than one!"

"Awaken . . ."

"Awaken!"

"Father of all Demons!"

"Awaken . . ."

It was the voice of a midsummer's dream,
Like love's lost caress—
It dripped with honey,
And was lived with deadly mockery.

I turned over slowly on my left side and, for the first time in the countless years since I have been afflicted with blindness, I could see.

I was in a great cavern—in the bowels of the earth. Into my ears came the distant roar of the Lulungwa-Mangakatsi like one continuous cataract of muted thunder. I could dimly make out mighty rocks in the darkness. In the near distance I could clearly see a mighty waterfall whose top and bottom were lost in dark chasms.

A tall silvery apparition appeared on the far side of the cavern. It was Ninavanhu-Ma, the first Goddess. I heard her voice saying, "You must surrender, Lumukanda. You must deliver yourself into our hands for punishment. You must be punished for all your sins. The earth does not want you, and neither do the heavens. And you are equally unwelcome in the Underworld of Evil."

"I do not fear you, Goddess," I replied. "I shall continue fighting you to the end of time."

I felt myself rising from the ground as everything vanished in a burst of silver light.

* * * * *

"Awaken, Outcast of the Ages, we have a long way to go to your kraal."

I opened my eyes and found that I was back in the Upper World and for the first time in a thousand years of blindness my eyes drank in the pure beauty of the blue skies, the breathtaking greens of the whispering forests and the purple of the distant brooding mountains. I felt like a man reborn, and suddenly my thousand years of earthly life seemed to slide off my shoulders and I was young again. I looked in rapt fascination at the surrounding landscape; I spent a long time drinking in the sight of two rainbow-hued birds pursuing each other in the blue skies above. The distant silver river that snaked its way through the green undulations held me in its spell.

I saw tiny canoes full of warriors crossing the river—far, far away; I saw a herd of more than fifty impala grazing at the base of the low hill on whose slopes I lay. I saw the long grass nodding and dancing as the lovelorn wind sang through it.

Yea-ha! After a thousand years of blindness, sight is a wonderful thing. Surely there is a great truth in the tribal saying that if one wishes to appreciate a good thing, one must first be well acquainted with its opposite.

I was conscious of a presence and I turned slowly. A woman, almost as tall and powerful as I am, stood there. Unlike my dark-brown skin her skin was as black and as smooth as polished ebony and she was as beautiful as only a goddess can be. Every curve of her womanly body spoke of beauty and perfection, and her wide, full-lipped mouth smiled mockingly at me: "Are we going to stay here forever, Lumukanda?"

It was Vuramuinda, my Fire Bride of those long centuries ago.

"I can see you Vuramuinda," I blurted out stupidly. "I can really see you!"

"Your long fall into the Underworld knocked sight back into your stupid eyes, baboon," she said, "and you had better start thinking of a very good explanation of where you have been to give to those people coming towards us. Some of them seem to be women of yours."

I glanced down the hill to where she pointed and I saw what looked like two full regiments of warriors advancing up the grassy hillside.

"How did they know I was here?"

"They must have followed the smell, Oh beloved Carrion," replied Vuramuinda. "You may not know it, old fool, but to those mortals down there you have been missing for one whole year."

"One whole year!" I could not believe it, but it was true nevertheless. As the warriors came closer I saw there were women among them, and also a man in the garb of a Royal Consort.

They had not yet seen us, but there was something about the leading woman that told me she had sensed our presence.

Suddenly Vuramuinda did something that left me totally speechless with surprise. She threw herself down beside me and her arms stole round my neck, holding me fast and crushing me down into the yielding grass. She started raining kisses on my mouth, neck, nose and forehead. The sound of long grass being crushed under many feet grew louder in my ears. A tall shadow fell over both of us and a soft voice said: "Oh . . .h!"

"Go away, you interfering fool!" hissed Vuramuinda to the youthful female intruder. "Can't a woman be with her husband in peace in this land any more?"

The young girl vanished and I heard a voice: "Princess Luanaledi, who are those people in the long grass over there?"

"It is father!" cried the girl. "We have found him at last . . . we have found him!"

There was a rush of many feet and Vuramuinda and I found ourselves surrounded by scores of warriors with very amused expressions on their faces.

"By my grandfather's - - - -!" swore a burly round-shouldered individual who looked like a gorilla's first cousin. "It is our chief all right . . . and as virile as ever! Where have you been, Great One?"

"And who is this woman, my Lord?" asked a tall woman—none other than Noliyanda.

"What is this woman, you should ask," said Vuramuinda. "Then you might get a sensible answer."

"Well, what is this woman then my Lord?" asked Noliyanda, completely taken aback.

"Are you asking about me?" purred Vuramuinda insultingly.

"I am addressing myself to my Lord and husband, strange one."

"Your husband? If this is your husband, why did you not cut your name symbols on his buttocks? Until you do that he is any woman's property. Now, believe it or not, beautiful pumpkin, I have decided to keep him all to myself."

"We shall see about that!" stormed Noliyanda. "Who are you?"

"Do you really want to know?"

"Of course!"

"I am what you waste yourself in imagining that you are."

"Oh!" said Noliyanda pleasantly. "And from under which rotting log did you crawl?"

Vuramuinda ignored the question and turned to me, saying softly (but loud enough for the guffawing warriors to hear): "Tell me, Lumukanda mine, is there a shortage of women in the land?"

"No," I answered. "Why do you ask?"

"No! Then why did you go to all this trouble of creating a thing like this one and then calling it your wife? You started an evil precedent, my love, and it will not be long before all a lovelorn potter and carver will have to do is to model and carve himself a wife, thus saving himself the expense of paying lobolo. You should be ashamed of yourself, Lumukanda, putting us decent natural women out of business!"

"Decent is not the word you should apply to yourself!" cried Noliyanda.

"Stop your rattling, you glorified puppet!" cried Vuramuinda. "When I want advice from a plaything like you, I'll ask for it."

A diminutive baby-faced woman interrupted hurriedly: "Peace, my sisters, peace. This is not the time for childish squabbles. Let us all go home and thank the Great Spirit that at last we have found Lumukanda on whom all our hopes of saving our Tribes rest."

"Well spoken, Oh Royal One Celiwe," said Noliyanda quietly. "We must let Lumukanda know of the terrible thing that has happened in the land, and perhaps he can tell us what is to be done."

"Do not tell me the land has been invaded again!" I cried, leaping to my feet.

"No, my Lord and husband," said Noliyanda. "The land has not been invaded . . . yet; neither is there any disastrous occurrence . . . yet. But about ten days ago the people of the two lands saw a terrible sign in the heavens. The sun was totally eclipsed at midday."

"Tell me about it," I commanded, sitting down on a rock.

"We were out in the fields, busy with the ploughing and sowing when suddenly it became dark," said Noliyanda, "and when I looked up I saw the sun was dim. Two women looked straight at the sun and were blinded. For a long time there was darkness over the land and the only sign of the vanished sun was a blinding glare from behind a black sun, two glares, one pointing east and the other west. It was terrifying, yet magnificent. But that is not all, my Lord and husband, that is not all. A day later, after this terrible omen of coming disaster, a group of four men entered the Royal Kraal on the pretext of bringing gifts of iron ore for making spears. These men we received and treated kindly indeed. But they were bent on evil, as we soon found out. They saw the triplets, Demane and Demazana, playing near the Great Hut and they playfully called the little ones. The children went to them and two of them seized the boys and ran into one of the empty huts with them. The remaining two then did a strange thing. They set the hut on fire with their two friends and the boys inside, and then they too crawled into the burning hut. But Lulama-Maneruana and Muwende-Lutanana ran into the burning hut and succeeded in rescuing the two children, although Maneruana's left arm was badly burnt. Mavimbela here hauled out one of the four men before the hut collapsed on the other three . . . and I will let him tell you what we learnt from him about this fantastic attempt at murdering the innocent children. Speak Mavimbela."

"I will indeed!" growled Mavimbela. "When I dragged out that struggling son of a hyæna, I said to him: 'All right, you filthy beggar, you shall tell me why you tried to murder our absent chief's children!' The stupid fellow shook his head and refused to answer me. Great One, I turned him over to the warriors and by my grandmother's - - - -, was the fool glad to start babbling! When he saw his - - - - being cut off and thrown to the dogs and a red-hot spear being applied to where it was, he started squawking and words poured out of his drooling mouth like a torrent."

"He told us the few Mambo still left in the land had formed themselves into a band dedicated to overthrowing you. They have already named one Sozozo the Fat as the new chief of the Western Mambo. Those four men were suicide volunteers whose duty it was to kill either Muwende-Lutanana or the children, because the Mambo believe it is your incestuous marriage to Lutanana which has angered the gods who now wish to bring disaster to the land."

"But Great Chief, I can assure you here and now that every one of your Indunas and warriors are loyal to you. All of us, in your Great Kraal and the ten military kraals, know that you did not marry Lutanana knowingly and for this reason we are standing firmly behind you . . . come what may."

"Thank you, Mavimbela," I responded. "But that does not alter the fact that I have unwittingly committed a gross and disgraceful sin, and I am left with an insoluble problem on my hands."

"What problem, Great Lumukanda?" asked the tiny baby-faced Nguni Queen Celiwe with a strange smile on her face.

"Unknowingly I was tricked into marrying and having children by my own daughter, and the problem facing me now is this—just what to do with these children. I cannot kill them and I cannot bear the realisation that for the rest of their lives they will carry with them the stigma of being children of incest. What am I to do?"

"Doubtless the Great Lumukanda thinks his problem is unique in the history of the Tribes," said Celiwe softly. "You tell him, Malandela."

The handsome thickset man in the garb of a Royal Consort said slowly: "Your problem can be solved, Oh Lumukanda, and that is why we are here—to help you solve it. But I must say I am very surprised that you, who have outlived many mortal generations, do not know this. We live in a turbulent world, Lumukanda, a world where many strange accidents happen—and the accident which has befallen you is by no means unusual, neither does it pose a problem to which there is no solution. My own grandfather married his own illegitimate daughter by accident in the land of the Nyanja and did not discover his mistake until ten years later. His problem was also solved in the same way that yours will be. What has happened to you is what the Wise Ones call 'icilo lo muzi' (Knot of confusion in the family), and Celiwe and I have been in your land for six whole months now, trying to find you and help you in unravelling this knot. This we hope to do soon and to the complete satisfaction of both the Nguni and the Mambo."

"But how?" I asked. "I don't see . . ."

"You will discover soon," said Celiwe sweetly.

Vuramuinda rose from the rock on which she had been sitting and contorted her face into an expression of self-importance—cleared her throat in a most unwomanly fashion and said: "Oh honourable bachelors and spinsters of the Mambo and Nguni cow thief tribes . . . I, Vuramuinda, the daughter of Nobody who comes from Nowhere, have a strong complaint to make to you. Not only are you, yes you, the most hypocritical, the most stupid, cowardly, bad-tempered cretins under this misbegotten sun, but you are also worm-eaten, mildewed, splay-footed sons of ungrateful hyænas into the bargain. You are all, deliberately and with malicious intent, trying to ignore the fact that this insignificant stranger is the one who found your silly old chief for you. I am the one who took care of him for you, and also restored his eyesight so that in future he may be able to have a good look at his women."

"You -----!" Mavimbela swore. "Do you mean that our venerable chief can see now, Oh Honourable Lady?"

"That," said Vuramuinda, "is just what I mean."

"By my father's -----!"

"My father," cried Luanaledi, "can you really see—after all these years? Can you see us, father?"

"I can see you, child. After a thousand years of blindness I can see at last."

"This is wonderful!" said Celiwe.

"The Great Spirit be praised!" cried Malandela.

Mavimbela expressed his jubilation with a string of foul curses.

"It is a great day," said Ntombela.

"You must be rewarded, Oh Unknown Lady," said Nsongololo gallantly to Vuramuinda. "Name any number of cows you want and you shall have them."

"Yes any number," said Noliyanda uneasily.

"I want only one ox," said Varumuinda with a roguish smile.

"One ox!" Malandela exclaimed in astonishment. "One ox after what you have done for us!"

"Yes, just one ugly, bony, hornless old ox."

There was a roar of laughter at this, because Vuramuinda had indicated me. Men rolled in the long grass and some danced about, tearing themselves with laughter.

"Oh no!" gasped Noliyanda.

"Oh yes!" responded Vuramuinda.

Once more I looked at everyone of my servants, friends and beloved ones in turn, drinking in every detail, every feature of their faces. The ugly gorilla-like visage of Mavimbela, the handsome serene face of Malandela, Ntombela's blunt fat visage and Nsongololo's long sloping muzzle, strongly reminiscent of a giraffe's. I drank in the face of Celiwe—the childlike innocence of the woman I madly coveted but could not have—a fruit placed beyond my reach by a cruel god. I turned my gaze to the heavenly features of the light-brown Noliyanda—the woman who was not a woman, and yet more of a woman than any of her kind. My own beautiful handiwork, with her wide forehead, her long nose and full mouth, her large deepset eyes and her jutting squarish chin with a slight cleft in it. My own creation, neither goddess nor human—an unhappy creature, human in shape, unhuman, yet more human than any human can ever be.

I saw Lulama-Maneruana hovering in the background like a lost sparrow. I saw what I had suspected for a long time, that this ravaging, brazen-featured wanton whose face was that of a wilful and stubborn slut, was of Bantu-Arabi parentage—a soulless half-caste from that hotbed of a harlotry in the south—Zima-Mbje, where Arabi slave raiders and Bantu maidens mate freely.

I stared in rapt fascination at her soft hair, her light skin and straight, almost aquiline, nose. So this was Lulama-Maneruana! So this was the woman destined to win undying fame as the Fallen Saviour of song and legend! I turned my eyes away and stared straight into the bitter, veiled eyes of Luanaledi, my eldest immortal daughter. I saw the strange hunger burning in my child's eyes. I saw the bitter lines about her beautiful mouth. I turned away and Vuramuinda's alien face smiled mockingly and half pityingly at me. She knew. She knew of the strange love Luanaledi held for me, and like me she sensed danger—danger in Luanaledi. This one-handed stormy daughter of Watamaraka seemed like a mamba poised to strike—but whom?

I heard Vuramuinda's unspoken thoughts ringing in my mind: "Watch that brat of yours!"

"Let us go home," I said to all those assembled. "We have much to plan and much to do."

As we made our way down the hill and into the forest towards the canoes, Malandela slung his heavy kalimba harp from his shoulder and began to sing his famous 'Song of Malandela' His manly voice rang through the forest as verse after verse of the wonderful song floated like a mellow breeze over our heads, to be lost in the distance:

Peace thee—Peace thee, Oh my spirit!
Bow thy head before the great Somandla—
Into His mercy now surrender thee;
Into His hands completely yield thee.

Ere thou wert born He cared for thee,
And when thou diest He shall be by thee . . .

BEHOLD THE PLAGUE

NIGHT has fallen and a savage storm is lashing the cringing land with thunder and hail. The rivers have been turned into roaring, hissing torrents and by the frequent light of the bluish flashes one can see them, borne relentlessly down towards the Zambezi, trees, bushes, zebras, more wild animals, two huts . . .

Water is knee-deep in places and the newly ploughed fields are flooded. The first rains of early summer have come with a devastating vengeance and summer has used the thunder horn-bugle to herald its arrival. The frowning heavens are torn apart by searing bolts of lightning. The young trees are stripped naked of their green foliage by a roaring sheet of hail, the size of fowl eggs.

Yes, the ravening heavens roar their spite upon the helpless land and even the trees are afraid. The howling dogs and cackling fowls have long since sought shelter under granaries. Some of the hens have lost their chickens and two young calves in the cattle pens are dead.

Such is life on earth—a destructive storm bringing hope for a year of plenty. Life and death go hand in hand. The one is but a reflection of the other—two facets of the same thing. The Wise Ones of the Tribes say 'Life is Death and Death is Life'. Without life there can be no death, and vice versa. Such is life on earth!

Inside the Great Hut of the Royal Kraal of the Western Mambo, strange and momentous things are about to happen. A man is about to dissolve the bond of fatherhood between himself and the daughter he accidentally married, proclaiming her a stranger—in strict accordance with the Laws of the Tribes.

There are eighty people inside the Great Hut and all of them have not tasted food or drink for ten whole days. Some of them are now weak with hunger and thirst and are lying on their sides on grass mats and leopard skins. They are awaiting the beginning of yet another ceremony—one of the many that rule a tribesman's life, as strings govern a puppet's limbs.

The roaring rain-drenched and lightning-torn night wears noisily on and soon it is midnight. And now the storm holds its savage breath. A silvery star peers shyly through a gap in the scowling clouds and near the Great Hut, just outside the door, comes the sound of a dog shaking water from its long lean body. There is still the heavy uneven sound of large drops from trees and the distant continuous rumble of sheets of water exploring new channels of flow.

There is the sound of fire sticks being briskly rubbed inside the darkened hut, and soon a shower of red sparks falls onto the small pile of dry grass in the centre of the great sunken fireplace. A woman—yes, it is Muwaniwani—blows into the pile of grass. There is a glow and smoke—a sudden flicker—and a burst of flame. Dry twigs are laid on top and they are ravenously devoured. Heavy logs follow and soon the whole interior of the hut is bathed in flickering light.

In the far corner of the hut a wickerwork cover opens on the floor and a tall ebony-skinned woman with flashing eyes emerges from the secret underground dwelling. It is Vuramuinda, the Black Goddess, and her silvery voice rings through the smoke-blackened interior of the hut: "The ceremony begins now. Lumukanda and Muwende-Lutanana must stand up and come near the fire."

I leave my seat between Noliyanda and Lulama-Maneruana and step close to the fire. Muwende-Lutanana also rises at a sign from Vuramuinda and comes to stand next to me—her eyes wide with mute wonder and fear. Vuramuinda picks up an all-metal copper Holy Axe and thrusts it deep into the fire, also a long, slim-bladed, iron knife with a wooden handle carved to represent the Star Serpent.

The little Nguni Matriarch Celiwe rises and picks up one of the fowls lying trussed in a dark corner of the hut, bringing it to the fireplace. She begins to pray:

"May the High Heavens look down upon what is taking place in this hut tonight and bless each and every one of the people taking part in this most holy of ceremonies. May the pure, distant, undefiled stars breath their scented breath of forgiveness upon all of us for the great sin, which was unwittingly committed in this kraal. May our ancestors in their wisdom and mercy plead with the Highest of the High to erase from the memory of men and gods the sin which Lumukanda and Muwende-Lutanana unknowingly committed, great and heinous though it be. May the Highest of the Most High remove the shadow of this very great transgression from the lives of the three innocents, Demane, Demazana and their brother who walks unseen with them alive in spirit.

"Since, Oh Great Spirit, Lumukanda had unknowingly made a wife of his own daughter, had taken to the love mat the fruits of his own loins, he has now come before you to ask your forgiveness and to break forever his claim of fatherhood over Muwende-Lutanana. Hear me, hear me, all my respected Ancestors! Hear me, Malembe, Vukela, Dlalela and Kanjane! Hear me as I pray to you. Plead, Oh plead with the Highest of the Most High, to forgive these people. Plead with the earth, the stars and the Great Waters to raise their voices and ask the Highest of the Most High to forgive his servants."

With these words she hurls the struggling fowl into the fire and at the same time Vuramuinda throws a bundle of dried mpepo plants into the pit. A cloud of white smoke rises from the fireplace and the smell of burning feathers combines with the fragrant smell of the mpepo incense. As Celiwe returns to the place where she had been sitting earlier, Vuramuinda's cold, mocking voice came to my ears through the smoke:

"Lumukanda, I, Vuramuinda, of no fixed abode and of no definite origin, do here and now demand that you declare truly before the Most High, before the Stars and before the Eternal Fire in the very Core of Eternity, before the mountains, the seas and the skies, and before all things that are upon this earth—did you deliberately and with sinful intent sleep with your own daughter? Did you knowingly have children by your own child?"

"No."

"Come close to me, Lumukanda, and address your denial to the Highest of the High."

I step over to her and she draws me very close to her. Side by side we stand, looking up—up, and slowly the roof of the hut fades—the upturned faces around me fade. They all vanish, and I find my stare penetrating space—far into the depths of Eternity. Far, far beyond the deepest reaches of Eternity; far beyond the outer frontiers of Eternal Darkness. I see a Shape, which is like no known shape on earth or under the stars. It is the Shape of Something Ultimate—something beyond Which and above Which there is and can be nothing greater, nothing more ultimate . . . Men call it God. Some call it the Ultimate, the Ultimate Cause, the Most Ultimate. Some recognize Its existence. Some doubt and even deny It. But there It is, recognized, doubted or denied—that Shape is there and I see It. Far is It above beings, mortal and immortal. Far is It above gods and goddesses — above spirits Ancestral and Existing. All these fear It — always. I have no fear of gods and goddesses, of Spirits, be they that of Nature, Evil or Creation. But before the Ultimate upon whom my eyes now focus, I tremble like any mortal should, immortal though I am. And to the Ultimate I address my denial: "No, I did not deliberately and knowingly take my own child, oh Highest of the High. You know I did not."

There comes a strange dizziness to my head. My body sags to the ground. But I remain standing. My soul—yes it is my soul that remains standing. I find myself on the edge of a great barren plain under a dark red sky. There, covering the entire horizon, is the Presence of the Ultimate. I am standing before It, like an aphid before a mountain. I feel naked. A voice like a thousand tempests cleaves my brittle soul: "You feature but insignificantly in My great experiment of Creation, and yet you have a part to play. I am interested in you. Stop defiling yourself with evil, I command you."

"Forgive me," I beg humbly.

"I forgave you long before you asked. Go now; be watchful always. You are alone in a hostile world. Your fellow immortals despise you and they wish to destroy you . . . but they shall fail. Work for Me and spread My name amongst the wretched mortals to whom I have sent you. You are my Chosen One."

Those words—those mysterious words. I am shocked into wakefulness. Vuramuinda bends over me, and for once I can see concern on her face. I hear her voice: "He has regained consciousness . . . the ceremony shall continue. Lumukanda, you have denied before the Highest of the Most High that you wilfully and knowingly slept with your own child and made a mother out of her, is that not so?"

"It is so."

"To the complete satisfaction of the people of the Mambo and Nguni Tribes, I, Vuramuinda, who loves you and who believes your denial, challenge you fully to confirm your denial by holding the red-hot Axe of Truth in your bare left hand."

"I accept that challenge."

Varumuinda draws out the almost white-hot copper axe and hands it to me, head foremost. I reach out, grab the axe by the middle of its long red-hot shaft and hold it aloft. The smell of burning flesh invades my nostrils and the pain is intense. But I hold it aloft.

"I ask you all within this hut," says Vuramuinda, "you who are of the Nguni Tribe and you of the Mambo Tribe . . . are you satisfied?"

Malandela's metallic voice answers: "I Malandela of the Nguni am speaking for the Nguni . . . we are more than satisfied."

"And I," says Mavimbela savagely, "am speaking for all the Mambo. We knew our chief was innocent, and we are completely satisfied."

"That is good," says Vuramuinda. "Put down the axe, Lumukanda."

I tear the axe off my left hand with my right, and deeply scorched flesh from my palm comes with it. The pain slowly evaporates.

"Sit down."

Vuramuinda draws the terrified Muwende-Lutanana to her and asks her a question in sign language. With an expression of unimaginable agony on her ebony features she shakes her head.

"You—still—love—him?"

Her eyes widen and she looks around nervously for a possible way of escape.

"Answer!"

She makes a sign in the affirmative.

"Why?"

She indicates that she does not know.

Vuramuinda's long fingers flutter as she tells Muwende-Lutanana the purpose of the ceremony we are now holding and she pauses now and again to ask the girl whether she really understands.

Vuramuinda takes the long iron knife from the fire and with a gasp Muwende sinks fainting to the ground. Celiwe and Maneruana revive her with cold water and as she regains consciousness the two women hold her down while Vuramuinda scorches some of the hair from the girl's armpits and below her navel. The rites involving the Axe of Truth and the burning off of hair are known as 'Fire Rites of Penance'.

Water and food are brought in and the gathering, excluding Lutanana, Vuramuinda and myself, enjoy its first meal in ten days of rigorous fasting. This concludes part one of the four-part ceremony.

* * * * *

The people have eaten their fill and my adopted son and two other boys bring in a black goat which is to be used in the second part of the ceremony. This goat is not going to enjoy his role one little bit. It is the 'Animal of Sin Bearing' and the sin I had committed with Lutanana will be transferred to it after which it will be promptly dispatched to beyond the borders of Outer Darkness.

There is a long time of waiting while people indulge in second helpings and now they sit around gathering strength for the dancing about to commence. Heavy drums are rolled in and the ceremony is continued.

Vuramuinda calls for a big grass mat to be brought near the fire and instructs Muwende-Lutanana and myself to lie on this mat. Now pandemonium is released as the masked drummers strike up weird rhythms with their hands on the taut skins and roaring, booming sounds fill the Great Hut. Malandela, Mavimbela, Ntombela and Celiwe jump to their feet and snatch up fowls from the bundle lying trussed in one corner. They shriek, caper, stamp their feet, to the savage beat of the drums—dancing in a series of mad circles, nearer and nearer to where we lie.

Everybody now joins in and the dust really starts flying. I see Mavimbela leap high into the air. I see Maneruana, Noliyanda and Vuramuinda turn themselves into ravening bolts of demoniac abandon—dancing, leaping and rolling on the ground. I am holding my breath for the Great Hut—it might tear off its foundations and take off into the air as a result of the explosions of incredible noise.

The dancing grows wilder; men and women fling off their loinskins and skin skirts and dance forth naked, maddened, as though all the demons of the Underworld have suddenly taken possession of them. Maneruana goes into a wide-eyed slack-mouthed trance and falls backwards, only to be kicked aside by Mavimbela and Vuramuinda.

With a torrent of savage oaths Mavimbela tears the fowl he had been holding to pieces and deposits the gory remains on the forms of Muwende-Lutanana and myself. Others follow suit and soon we are covered with feathers, blood, and sticky intestines—a warm mess symbolising the sin we have committed.

The drumming, screeching, bellowing and cursing are still building up to a deafening crescendo. Even the dogs outside are now competing with us at the tops of their voices. I cannot hear it, but I know that their sympathetic participation has infected others in neighbouring kraals and in kraals far beyond.

Vuramuinda breaks away briefly to light three large lamp bowls full of hippo oil, with calf skin wicks floating inside. At the height of their frenzy the men, led by Mavimbela, now close in a tight circle around the fire in the centre and begin to extinguish it.

Malandela and Mavimbela add the finishing touches by dancing into the middle of the fireplace, trampling the hot wet ash into a muddy pulp. Vuramuinda, Maneruana and Noliyanda proceed to excavate the fireplace with heavy hoes to the accompaniment of the drums.

The hole is now filled with grass and twigs and quick-burning marula logs and a roaring fire is promptly lit by throwing in one of the hippo-fat lamps. The interior of the hut is like a furnace. Water is rushed in and the women proceed to wash Lutanana and my self from head to foot, using powdered calabash seeds and loofahs. A great leopard skin mattress is brought in and on this we lie down while we are rubbed dry with jackal skin towels.

Mavimbela hauls the black goat near the fire and starts dancing wildly around it, pummelling it savagely and calling it all sorts of names, the very best from his repertoire. To this the goat takes exception and butts him cruelly in the belly sending him sprawling, his last breath turning into a foul curse.

"Aieeeee!" shrieks Ntombela, "that is a very good omen. That goat is aggressive, and he will make a good messenger to carry our chief's sins to hell. Nothing will get in its way . . . what a good omen!"

Meanwhile the women have been collecting the mutilated fowls and have stuffed them and their intestines into two grass baskets. These are now tied to the back of the goat, held fast by a blaspheming Mavimbela. The dirty water with which we have been washed is poured over the goat which glares savagely at us and tries its best to have another go at Mavimbela.

At a signal from the Black Goddess the drums roar and Mavimbela pushes the goat into the white-hot fire pit. Women add twigs and heavy logs and the fire roars in fresh fury while savage dancing starts again.

"Go, Oh honourable goat," shrieks the dancing and twisting Lulama-Maneruana. "Go straight to hell and take all our sins with you . . . and leave us in peace and happiness."

Lutanana and I are bathed again and yet again. We are rubbed with earth and ash, and for the tenth time with scalding hot water. Finally we are rubbed dry and Vuramuinda calls for silence.

"We have now come to the end of the second part of this ceremony, and both Lumukanda and the young girl Muwende-Lutanana have now been purified of their sin." She says "We shall proceed with the part where Chief Lumukanda must break his bond of fatherhood with Muwende-Lutanana and openly declare her no longer a child of his. What we now require is that one man must come forward and declare himself prepared to answer to fatherhood of this girl. To this man Lumukanda must apply for permission to re-marry his daughter, who will cease to be a daughter of Lumukanda after we have completed the part of the ceremony we are about to perform.

Malandela and Celiwe come to their feet and take a few steps forward: "We shall adopt Muwende-Lutanana as our daughter," says Celiwe softly.

"And I, Malandela, champion of the Nguni, challenge any man to a death duel who dares to dispute that I am not, in fact, the father of Muwenda-Lutanana. Is there such a man?"

There is none, and Vuramuinda's voice proceeds, with an undertone of mockery: "Since there is no dispute, we shall continue. Lumukanda is now required to break his bond of fatherhood and you are all required to assist him with your prayers."

Vuramuinda cuts a tuft of hair from my head and tosses it into the fire. She does likewise with Muwende-Lutanana. In strict accordance with the High Laws Noliyanda and her former enemy Lulama-Maneruana smear themselves with ashes and they lift Muwende-Lutanana up in their arms, bringing her close to where I am standing. I call upon the Highest of the Most High to witness my breaking of the bond of parenthood with Muwende, and with this I spit at Muwende and turn my back on her.

Muwende is laid near the door of the hut while I and the three women known as my High Queens, Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and Lulama-Maneruana—I have reluctantly accepted the latter as a Royal Concubine—walk over the prostrate girl in the final act of disownment. We walk out of the hut, leaving Celiwe and Malandela to perform the Ceremony of Adoption.

* * * * *

Dawn crept up to the horizon and the sun peered hesitantly over it a short while later. After ensuring that everything was safe, it rose boldly into the blue heavens. When it assumed its lofty throne in the midday sky the ceremony ended and the feasting began.

Three days later the Matriarch of the Nguni, Celiwe, and her First Consort Malandela, took their adopted daughter Muwende-Lutanana and her three children, Demana and Demazana, to their land, whence they were to send her back to me as my bride—after the payment of lobolo. I felt I could look the world straight in the eye again. I found time to attend to my affairs and my responsibilities as chief again, after an absence of more than a year.

The first thing I did was to call my Indunas together to discuss what was to be done about the rebellious remnants of the Mambo tribe.

"The trouble, Oh Great One," complained Mavimbela angrily, "is that we do not know just where the sons of - - - - dogs are hiding."

"That is soon remedied," said Vuramuinda. "Bring me a bowl full of water . . . a clay bowl."

The bowl was brought and Vuramuinda slowly stirred the water and withdrew her finger, allowing the water to settle. Within the water she conjured a clear picture of our opponents hiding in the Madlonti mountains. "So that is where the dogs are hiding!" cried Nsongololo. "Let us go there and wipe them out, Oh Great Chief."

"There must be no killing," I replied. "Those people are misguided. We must capture them all alive and put them to work on a scheme I have in mind."

"So be it, Oh Chief," Nsongololo responded with a smile. "The idle dreamers must be given something to do."

"Call out two regiments and we shall go after them at sunset," I commanded.

"Take us with you" pleaded Vuramuinda, taking Noliyanda's hand. "We shall use our powers to scare these fools into submission."

* * * * *

Sozozo was a very happy man. He had just murdered two men and proclaimed himself chief of a small band of about five hundred men and women hiding in the Madlonti mountains. Although night had fallen and the bodies of his victims had long since grown cold at his feet, he was still letting all and sundry know for the hundredth time that he was now the Big Man of the sorry remnants of the scattered Mambo Tribe. In one hand he held the roast leg of a goat and in the other he brandished a club still soiled with the blood of his two unfortunate victims.

"Do you hear me, you green-bellied scum?" he bellowed at the top of his voice. "Do you hear me well and clearly? I am now your chief, by right and might—and I dare any of you miserable dogs to dispute my claim! I am now going to appoint ten men amongst you to be my Indunas. And all ten must lick the dust off my feet and swear allegiance to me."

"B-but," an old man named Mpongo protested, "the Laws of the Mambo say an Induna must swear allegiance by laying his hand on his chief's left thigh, Sozozo, and not by licking his feet."

"You shall do what I say without question!" bellowed Sozozo, his incredibly fat face darkening and his bloodshot eyes bulging obscenely. "I have already laid down new laws. And as from now you are no longer to call yourselves the Mambo, but the Masozozo. You are my people — the people of Sozozo. You shall obey me, and me alone, morning, noon and night. To start with, I want the prettiest of your daughters as my wives and I want lots of your best beer and meat. Hurry now, shesha! Bring these to me now."

The frightened people jumped to obey the gross vagabond's commands and while they were busy at the tasks Sozozo appointed ten very fat men as his Indunas, and ended by crowning himself High Chief with an improvised and rather clumsy royal headdress.

He and his ten Indunas then sat down and ate like greedy hippos the food that was brought in—celebrating their first night of power. They consumed piles of meat and nearly drowned themselves in a lake of corn beer. They toppled over where they were sitting and fell asleep, each with two terrified girls in his arms.

They were awakened by a blood-curdling scream such as can only be produced by a demon from the Underworld. The men sat up and jumped to their feet like one man. There, in the mouth of the great cave which Sozozo had named his 'Lions Den', was the most hideous female demon ever seen.

She was glowing a bright red all over and had only one huge eye in her otherwise featureless face. A large fanged mouth leered between her breasts.

Sozozo was the first to find a voice with which to scream and legs with which to run into the furthest interior of the cave. The newly appointed Indunas tried to hide themselves by digging their faces into the bat guano on the floor of the cave.

The demon told the terrified girls to return to their families and, after beating up Sozozo and his Indunas with a heavy knobkierie, she said: "Run, you carrion animals. Run and go straight to High Chief Lumukanda and surrender yourselves to him. Tell him the Red Devil sent you. . . ."

Sozozo shot out of the cave like an arrow, with his ten Indunas anxious to do better. They dashed down the mountainside like feathers pursued by a tempest. They ran slap into another she-devil—a green one this time—and this hastened considerably their speed through the forest.

The guards at the gates of Tulisizwe saw eleven very fat men running, touching the ground only here and there and squealing like so many biped bush-pigs. The surprised warriors watched in blank astonishment as the panting fugitives ran straight into the gate of the largest cattle pen and started digging holes in the manure.

"Get out of there!" yelled one of the warriors. "Get out of that manure, you fools—have you gone mad?"

The men crawled deeper into the manure until only their heads showed. Their eyes were glazed with fear and the hair of Sozozo and two others had turned grey.

"Surround this heap and keep a close watch on these shivering fat-bellies," bellowed a battle leader. "We shall have to keep them here until our chief returns."

When we returned to the Great Kraal at midday of the following day, bringing with us five hundred would-be Mambo rebels, we found a full company of fifty warriors guarding a pile of wet manure in which eleven men seemed to be hiding—or at least trying their best to hide. I went up and smiled down upon them, most unpleasantly. "I see you, Oh rebellious ones. Tell me, are you yam plants?"

"Go away, you incestuous wizard!" bellowed Sozozo. "You can't kill me, you dare not try. I am the High Chief of the Mambo. I am now your superior and I command you—go away!"

"Is that dung-heap your throne, Oh new High Chief?" I asked with a sneer. "Surely the Great Hut is yonder."

"Go away, you son of a man-eating wanton."

"Listen Sozozo," I replied, very pleasantly, "you are talking yourself into my biggest stewpot. You seem to have forgotten that I indulge in excentricities of diet."

"You wouldn't dare . . ."

I turned to the warriors and commanded: "Take all of them to the cooks. They are to be tied to poles and they are to be fattened even more. I want to enjoy them one by one, in my own time."

After that I called my queens and my Indunas together and spoke to them as follows: "My people and my wives, we must now make preparations to meet the disasters foreshadowed by the sun's eclipse which you saw. These coming disasters can only be of the following nature: invasion, which we are strong enough to repel, a famine or a pestilence. One of the last two is the most likely. But we must prepare ourselves to face either. The land of the Mambo is vast and mostly deserted, and it is my intention to turn it into one big cornfield, the biggest cornfield in the land. And I am sure we can do it. We must plough and sow day and night. We must cut down whole forests and plant corn and yams everywhere. I shall send messengers to Celiwe and Malandela to ask them to send all the Mambo refugees back, by force if need be. I want every hand in this land on the handle of a hoe. The survival of both tribes may depend on what we now plan to do."

Blacksmiths went into action immediately, forging tens of thousands of heavy hoes and axes. Soon every warrior, every woman and child, was out in the veld ploughing and sowing. Tilled lands began to advance, to creep over hills and through vales, as tens of thousands of cursing warriors and bad-tempered women laboured day and night at the most unusual task of all time—turning the land into one vast cornfield.

Two moons fled by and still the work went on, gaining pace as thousands of sullen Mambo were herded back to their homeland by Nguni regiments.

The rains came, the corn grew, and the ploughing and sowing were accelerated. At last, after three solid moons of sweat and toil exactly three-quarters of the land stood under corn—from horizon to horizon. The angry and lazy Mambo talked openly of revolt and many were my own warriors who started calling me a madman and a tyrant, with strings of suitable adjectives. Many were the blistered and calloused hands in the land by the time I calculated we had done enough.

In those three months of toil and tears I had made myself the most hated chief of all time and only my persistent threat to cast an evil spell on anyone found guilty of insubordination kept things going according to plan. Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and I had to use our voodoo powers once or twice to scare the lives out of some angry Mambo men and women who threw down their hoes and took to the forests. I threatened once to turn six mutinous warriors into hyænas in public—which I very nearly did—to discourage a general revolt in one area.

Eventually the work was finished—the ploughing and sowing, that is—and the people assumed the task of guarding all the lands against the hazards and the whims and fancies of nature. I forced thousands of already infuriated people to take up posts and beat drums to scare the clouds of finches and frighter away herds of wild animals. Ten full regiments were out continuously, chasing animals and shooting with bow and arrow, and sling-stones, finches and other birds—a rather humiliating chore for full-blooded warriors.

Then Vuramuinda and Noliyanda did something that was both strange and unusual, and which brought wonderful and unexpected results. They called upon an old wood-carver and his assistants to carve numerous small ebony masks representing themselves, and they instilled in these masks voodoo powers guaranteed to bring good luck to all wearing them. They publicly announced that a mask would go as a trophy to any man, woman or child, who could produce evidence that he or she was responsible for the death of more than a thousand finches while watching the corn anywhere in the land.

The result was astonishing. Every man, woman and child in the now fully populated land of the Western Mambo declared open war on the destructive birds. Within ten days people were making their way in thousands to the Great Kraal carrying large skin bags full of tens of thousands of dead finches as proof of their prowess. Within one month my wives had made presentations of five thousand of these small good luck masks. The corn flourished. Good rains and plenty of sunshine showered their blessings on our efforts. The sorghum ripened and harvest time arrived.

The Mambo streamed from their kraals in multitudes to reap the ripe corn. Now there was no cursing and scowling. All the people hurled themselves with an almost fanatical dedication upon their task of gathering the harvest. This dedication was considerably enhanced by a knowledge that further good luck masks were due to those who could claim, from any district in the vast land, that they had reaped a thousand grain baskets of corn within eight days.

While the reaping was in progress I gave a full regiment of warriors the task of constructing ten of the largest granaries ever built on earth. Each granary could accommodate a thousand men, with some room to spare, and stood on no less than eighty wooden posts well planted in the earth. Each was built entirely of skins on a stout sapling framework. This consumed no less than three hundred ox hides. There were ten entrances to each dome-shaped granary.

The outside of each granary was heavily coated with fat from a hundred hippos to make it waterproof. It was not long before the amused people started referring to these granaries as the black domes of mad Lumukanda. Each granary stood next to a military kraal and was heavily fortified. A short path flanked on either side by a great stockade linked the granary to the kraal so that in the event of a raid the warriors could dash from the kraal to man the granary stockade without exposing themselves.

Each granary contained enough grain to feed a million people for fifty days and yams to feed the same number for ten days or more.

The people never stopped thinking I was mad as they brought the hundreds of thousands of baskets full of yams and sorghum to the granaries. Many were the sly jokes cracked about me and my ridiculous enterprise. Some said I had developed a leaking stomach which needed constant filling. The more imaginative said I had started a secret tokoloshe farm somewhere and that all this was intended for food for their breeding. If only the stupid mortals had known. . . .

It was towards the end of the harvesting and storing of the grain that Queen Celiwe of the Nguni visited me once again, bringing Muwende-Lutanana and her children, Demane and Demazana, back to the land of the Mambo. The diminutive matriarch came into the Great Kraal attended by two regiments of warriors and announced with a glint of mischief that she had left a little gift for me outside in the forest, and asked whether I would be so kind as to fetch it. She gave me the directions before escorting Muwende-Lutanana and her children into Vuramuinda's hut.

I took Ntombela and Mavimbela and set out over the golden cornfields towards the distant forest. On reaching it I sent Mavimbela in to get the little gift. The fierce Induna went in and returned, cursing most foully.

"What is it, Oh Mavimbela?" I asked. "Why are you empty-handed?"

The foul language continued to flow from his lips and he concluded by saying: "They cannot do this to my chief! Wait till I lay my hands on that filthy little hyæna Celiwe. She cannot do this to you, Oh Great One!"

"Swallow a stone, Mavimbela, swallow a stone and tell us calmly just what has happened," said Ntombela.

"Come and see for yourselves."

We followed him to a small clearing in the forest and there we saw the most amazing sight of all time — a company of grinning Nguni warriors guarding nearly two thousand pretty girls. "Your gift, Great Lumukanda," grinned the battle leader in charge of the warriors. "Your gift from Celiwe of the Nguni."

"We shall need more than one of your granaries to store them in," bellowed Mavimbela.

"No, Mavimbela, we shall build three great huts in the Royal Kraal for these beautiful wives of mine and you shall have the honour of guarding them."

"Great One, you can tell me to do anything—to go out and kill a lion with my bare hands, to go and wrestle with a crocodile. But—I beg you, do not make me guard these women."

"I have spoken, Mavimbela. Now you will be kind enough to escort my wives to the Royal Kraal and there guard them until further notice. You shall enjoy your new appointment."

On reaching the Great Kraal I found Celiwe staring in blank amazement at the granary. "What is that huge dome there, Lumukanda? Is it true that you are storing grain in that . . . that huge thing?"

"Yes, Royal Celiwe, I am storing corn in that, and nine others like it."

"But why, Lumukanda?"

"Believe it or not, Celiwe, but I can foresee the greatest famine of all time in the very near future."

"Somandla, save us!"

"He gave us brains to enable us to save ourselves. He has no time for puny mortals on a plaything world."

Celiwe smiled, saying: "I do not think he has time for puny immortals either."

"Neither do I. But tell me, Royal Celiwe, why have you played such a trick on me?"

"You mean the girls? I hope they give you much pleasure. I spent six whole months scouring the country for girls as near to me in looks as possible, to present to you."

"But why, Celiwe, why?"

"Let us be frank with each other, Oh Lumukanda. I love you as the earth loves the rain. And I know you love me too. But alas, as Queen of the Nguni I must bear it. A High Law of the Nguni forbids a ruler to marry a foreigner. So I have sent you these two thousand girls to occupy in your heart the place I bitterly long for but cannot occupy. Please love them for my sake."

"I will, Little One, but I have sworn, as a result of what happened between me and Lutanana, to deny myself women for three years."

"Oh no!" she cried, her great eyes widening. "You are in for trouble then, Great Immortal. Those girls are not only the prettiest in the land of the Nguni; they are the most hot-blooded wantons ever born into the bargain. Sooner or later they are going to come after you like a pack of hungry hyænas."

"They wouldn't dare! Every woman in my seraglio will respect my vow."

"Your Black Goddess Vuramuinda, and Noliyanda and Lulama-Maneruana might take strong exception to not being slept with, Oh Lumukanda. A woman gets very offended when a man ignores her, as you well know."

"They can all go and milk a zebra," I said, as we went back to the kraal along the fortified passage.

"Tell me, Lumukanda, are you happy in your life?"

"Do you really want to know, Little One?"

"Please."

"I am not, Celiwe. My life has been, still is, just one long, rock-strewn path of misery. I live only to carry out the mission given me by the Highest of the Most High."

"Oh! Can I be so bold as to ask what that mission is?"

"Your little brain might not fully comprehend. But I shall try to explain. You see, the lesser gods, led by the First Goddess, Ninavanhu-Ma, have been trying to destroy the Bantu in various ways. The Bantu, as a product of Creation, are a danger to the old gods.

"Destroy the Bantu? But why, why?"

"In the far-distant future, the furthest future you can imagine, a chief is going to be born who will challenge the very gods and enslave them. He will be born among the Bantu and his name will be Luzwi-Muundi. He will be so powerful and so wise that he will give immortality to every man and woman on earth. This chief, who will be born some twenty-eight thousand years from now, will turn men into indestructible spirits with unimaginable powers. These people will conquer the Mother of Creation and make the very stars do obeisance before them. These people shall give blood and a thinking brain to the mountain Killima-Njaro, and use it to conquer the Great Waters over which they will walk as one walks on solid ground. The Holy Chief Luzwi-Muundi shall train elephants into spear-carrying warriors and lions into wise counsellors with the ability to speak the tongue of men. The armies of Luzwi-Muundi will besiege the Hidden Kraal of the gods and capture them, and enslave them. An end will be put to greed, anger, murder, war and famine. The whole world will be turned into a soft, scented paradise in which undying men and women will live in peace and happiness forever.

"But the lesser gods do not want this. They do not want Luzwi-Muundi to be born and they know that if they destroy the Bantu completely in the next two thousand years this will not happen. I am here to thwart them again and again.

"The gods are trying all kinds of ways to destroy the Bantu. They sent the Strange Ones to enslave the tribes and exterminate them, more than two thousand years ago. Now they are sending slave raiders to ravage and denude parts of the country of its inhabitants. And they are going to try again and again in the future, while I shall do my best to thwart them."

Celiwe was sobbing silently as we entered the kraal. As we crawled into the empty Great Hut she said: "Give me your lips, Lumukanda."

Kneeling just inside the sunbathed entrance of the Great Hut we kissed briefly, savagely.

"I shall always love you, unhappy immortal," she breathed. "In your hour of sorrow always remember—Celiwe is there."

"I shall remember, Celiwe. I shall remember."

We broke away quickly as I sensed Vuramuinda coming towards the hut. She entered and smiled sweetly at Celiwe, who smiled back equally warmly. Vuramuinda then told me she had had to knock Luanaledi unconscious when she caught the latter trying to brain Muwende-Lutanana with a small grindstone.

"I must keep an eye on Luanaledi," said the Black Goddess. "This is her third attempt to murder Lutanana. I think the girl is mad."

* * * * *

Celiwe stayed with us for the rest of the winter and left for the land of the Nguni early in the first moon of the early summer. As usual, I ordered the Mambo out on the cornfields and soon we were busy ploughing and sowing again.

The rains came—the corn grew—and the second moon of spring fled by. Then the cruel gods struck their first terrible blow. The rains abruptly stopped and a burning sun glared malevolently at a shrinking earth from radiant cloudless skies. The tender corn drooped like heartbroken virgins, ruined and deserted by cruel lovers. The bawling cattle grew thin as the grass slowly dried. Rain-making ceremonies were held everywhere, ceremonies in which naked girls and old women danced in great circles around idols of Ninavanhuma, the First Goddess.

The rains came. The drooping corn revived. The grass grew greener than before. And then came the scourge of Africa—locusts.

The first hint we had of the presence of this dreaded pest in the land was a message—a drum message—relayed from the distant land of the Lunda in the west and warning all tribes to be on the alert for the vast swarms that were winging and breeding their way south-east from the land of the Ba-Luba.

The Laws of the Tribes say that all messages of this kind must be relayed by drum from kraal to kraal and from land to land. Any tribe failing to relay a message as important as a locust plague immediately fell under a High Curse and it had become a point of honour for all the other tribes to attack such a tribe and wipe it out.

Immediately after the arrival of the message the Mambo ‘drummers of honour’ hauled out their huge signal drums and relayed the dread warning from kraal to kraal right into the land of the Nguni, who in turn relayed it into the land of the Nyanja.

Two days later, Vuramuinda and Noliyanda called me to the stockade of the Great Kraal. There I found women and warriors standing and watching, eyes wide with horror, the reddish-brown clouds approaching low over the north-western horizon—a solid wall of millions upon millions of locusts drifting slowly and relentlessly nearer.

A hoarse agonised cry exploded from one of the warriors as he pointed to an equally dense cloud moving in from the south-west.

“Out all available grain baskets!” I shouted. “Out all skin bags and big spare cooking pots! All warriors, all men and women—out of the kraal, quick! Drummers, call out all people of the neighbouring kraals. We must build a chain of fire to stop those locusts. Out all regiments! They will not eat our grain; we are going to eat them.”

* * * * *

Torches were applied to all the piles of dry grass and twigs arranged in a great crescent facing the oncoming swarms and a sheet of white smoke billowed upwards to the sky. Green branches were laid on the fires to increase the density of the smoke. The fires were tended ceaselessly by tens of thousands of men, women and children from scores of kraals. The mighty wall of billowing smoke was a spectacular sight.

The locust swarms hummed closer to the wall of smoke and fire, leaving a stretch of desolation in their wake. They consumed every blade of green grass and every leaf of the tall trees. Millions settled and laid eggs, soon to hatch young to partake in the devastation. They dropped in their millions as they came against the unbroken wall of smoke. They dropped until the ground within the crescent was a writhing sea of crawling destruction. Men and women waded knee-deep into the vast mass, scooping up great grass bowls full and pouring them into the large grain baskets, each big enough to contain two men. Ox-sleds hauled dozens of these baskets to and from the kraals where old women were busy with pots, making large dumps of cooked locusts.

For five days the desperate battle against the locusts raged. Many thousands of great grain baskets full of roasted locusts found their way into my already overflowing granaries.

Finally the locusts broke through the wall of smoke. We could not maintain the defensive operation. The sky turned black and the land became alive with them as they winged and hopped their way eastward. But we were not disheartened—they still met with bitter opposition. We set entire fields on fire, destroying millions upon millions of the invaders in each field. Whole mopani forests were set alight and billions of locusts were charred. But millions more came and passed—and bred—to spread more destruction further afield.

People lost all their crops. The cattle lost all their grazing. Starving cows died calving—goats died. So did many of the wild animals of the forests.

Vultures came in their thousands, gorging themselves to bursting. And in their wake came the epidemic.

BEHOLD THE GREAT DEATH

Peace thee, peace thee—Oh my spirit—
Bow thy head before the great Somandla;
Into His mercy now surrender thee,
Into His hands, completely yield thee.

IT was midday and the sun shone fiercely from a dazzling sky on whose pale blue expanse not a single cloud was to be seen. Underfoot, the ground was as hot as a furnace and a heavy veil of stifling heat hazed over the land like a transparent mist.

The small lake, towards which the five girls were coming in single file with heavy water claypots on their heads, was steaming hot and a haze of vapour hung in the stagnant air above its slimy green water. The five girls were walking on the dry, blasted, locust-cropped grass on the edge of the stony footpath, carefully avoiding the blistering ground.

"Aieeee!" cried the leading girl whose name was Zodwa (short for Ntombi-Zodwa), "the sun is hotter than the bottom of a frying pot. Oh my sisters, I can hardly see with all the sweat pouring down my face."

"Be careful that the sun does not melt you out of existence, Oh Zodwa," said the third girl in line. "You are so fat that you might melt quicker than we."

"You are always jealous of my figure, you tall thin piece of dried meat you," Zodwa replied tartly to the third girl, whose name was Ntutana. "You are always the envious one."

"Hai-ya!" jeered Ntutana, "I would rather be a tall thin piece of dried meat than a heavy clumsy sorghum-meal dumpling, Oh Zodwa."

"You forget, Oh Ntutana," said the soft-spoken second girl, Duduzile, "that men take no notice of tall thin women."

"I do not need you to tell me, you little mouse. Shut your birdlike mouth quickly before I feed you a fist!"

"You Ntutana?" asked Duduzile softly. "Have you forgotten all the fists I fed you three days ago?"

"Yey-yieeee!" cried Zodwa, turning round slowly. "I will have no fighting between you brawling mad fools today. I am sick of your constant squabbling."

"As you say, Zodwa," murmured Duduzile.

"Yes, as I say, you bloodthirsty little she-jackal!" shrieked the leading girl. "It is high time you got yourself a man to tame you, you little bully. I am getting tired of your habit of picking fights with Ntutana."

"Ntutana's mother always picks fights with my mother," replied Duduzile mildly.

"Your mother's quarrels are none of our business," cried Zodwa sternly. "You must learn to respect Ntutana, you lawless little hag; you must respect your father's first wife's daughter."

"If you fight with Ntutana again we shall all beat you up, Duduzile," said the rather ill-favoured fifth girl Nonsizi, in heavy tones. "The High Laws say the daughters of one man must never fight amongst themselves."

The fourth girl, Tandiwe, took no part in this bickering because she was deaf and could not hear what her sisters were talking about. But it was she who first saw the three young men crouching behind a bush and surveying the girls with hopeful, sheeplike eyes. Tandiwe tapped Nonsizi on the shoulder and pointed at the bush behind which three heads had just bobbed down out of sight.

"What is it, Tandiwe?" asked Nonsizi at the top of her voice. "What is behind that bush?"

"Three young men," replied Tandiwe, who could hear nothing less than a shout.

"Ignore them—pretend they are not there."

The girls came to the little half-dry lake and started scooping up the sun-baked water with gourd scoops into the clay pots, each trying her best to ignore the three love-struck young men who had left the bush and were now coming stealthily up to them.

"I see you, Oh beautiful ones," said one of the young men gently.

The five girls coldly ignored the greeting as though it had not been spoken and continued with great deliberation their task of filling the clay pots.

"Oh, happy is he into whose hands one of you has fallen, Oh beautiful butterflies," said the young man again. "Oh happy will be the man that will one day marry one of you."

"And you are not that man," Zodwa responded, turning upon him suddenly. "You had better turn around and go straight home to your mama before we spank your behind, Oh little boy."

"It would be an honour to be spanked by your beautiful hand, Oh star of my waking dreams," murmured the young man with a bright ivory-white smile.

"Star of your waking dreams, do you say?" asked Zodwa, her eyebrows rising in mock surprise. "Ahhhh, poor little boy . . . poor little boy, so you dream in daytime do you?"

"Yebo, oh bright star of the dark skies of my life; I do dream in daytime and I always dream of you."

"Well, you can just carry on dreaming for all I care."

"My vein's desire, please to remember that today is the day you promised to give me the answer I have been begging you for two whole years now. I am sick of waiting and the suspense is killing me."

"The suspense can kill you thrice for all I care, Oh Gawula, son of Mtombo," said Zodwa spitefully. "You have waited two years for my answer and, by the stars, you shall wait for ten years more."

"No, Ntombi-Zodwa," replied the young man in a cold and deadly voice, "I shall wait no more. I am warning you here and now to give me your answer today."

"Or else what, son of a green-bellied hyæna?"

Gawula did not answer. Instead, he drew one of his short heavy spears from behind his black shield and, before Zodwa could stop him, he had given himself a nasty cut with it above the left breast. The four girls and the two other young men cried aloud in alarm and dismay. Zodwa leapt upon Gawula and pinned his arms to his sides, an expression of horror distorting her face. "Gawula! Gawula . . . are you mad?"

"I want my answer from you Zodwa; I want my answer here and now. Say yes you love me or I shall stab myself and die at your feet. I am not joking."

"Gawula," sobbed Zodwa, "Gawula, can't you see that I have already given you your answer? Can't you see I love you? Do I have to tell you that I love you? I loved you since the first day we met. Here, may be this should convince you."

She undid one of the cowrie-shell strings around her waist and tied it around the bleeding Gawula's neck. Then she raised herself on tiptoe and kissed him full on the forehead. "Beloved one, you did not have to do this to yourself. I would have given you the token of acceptance in any case. I love you Gawula. Mother was right after all when she warned me to be careful of you. She said you are a hot-headed, impulsive fool."

"I know, beloved one, I know. I did act like a fool. Forgive me my love. Now let me go and wash off this blood."

"Let me help you, Gawula. I always carry some wound medicine in this little pouch."

She undid a small impala-skin pouch hanging from a copper-bead necklace and shook out a lump of greenish stuff into her right hand. All first-born daughters had to wear such a pouch around their necks whenever they led their sisters to the riverside to get water or to the cornfields to hoe or reap. This little pouch contained a lump of medicine that should be used immediately if one of the girls was bitten by a snake or injured by a hoe.

The others crowded round as Gawula cleaned the blood off his wound and Zodwa applied the greasy medicine.

The two other young men, Mvezi and Fanyana, took their sweethearts, Duduzile and the ugly Nonsizi respectively, into the forest for a walk in the cool shade of the trees and to talk such intimate drivel as young and hot-blooded lovers talk to each other when all by themselves.

Never was there a pair better matched than Mvezi and Duduzile, except perhaps for the pair Nonsizi and Fanyana.

Mvezi was short, thickset and round of face, with monkeylike features and a light-brown skin. He had a very quick temper. His sweetheart, Duduzile, was a tiny, pretty little thing also with a light skin, also soft-spoken and with an equally fiery temper.

Fanyana was monstrously ugly, with a dark-brown skin, and he was huge, slow-witted and clumsy in almost anything he did. His bride-to-be, Nonsizi, was just as ugly and just as slow-witted. But she had a beautiful figure that compensated for her ugliness. The people of the village of these young people waited with great impatience for their day of marriage, because for people to be so well matched as these four, was something that happened once in a hundred years. People referred to them as the 'four little doves of our village'.

After the four had gone into the forest, Zodwa and Gawula also departed. The tall, thin Ntutana and her deaf cousin Tandiwe were left alone under the tree to guard the clay pots in the cool shade.

Tandiwe had not yet reached the age when girls are allowed to love and to be loved, being not yet twenty-five years old. But Ntutana was an unlucky girl. No man wanted her, and the reason for this was plain enough to see. She was too wide-shouldered, too narrow-hipped, and altogether too thin. She was the type of girl men take and marry, not for love and for bearing children but to work in the fields and to cook. Hers was a bleak future indeed. She was tormented by asthma and also by a searing loneliness which made her cry every night while the other girls stole out of the kraal to meet their lovers under the stars. Her father, the great lion hunter Madevu, hated her—and her mother was the only one who had any love for her among the many men, women and children in Madevu's village.

Mvezi and Duduzile had been walking hand in hand for some time before Duduzile started complaining that she was feeling dizzy.

"There you start again," cried Mvezi irritably. "You always love to spoil our appointment one way or the other. If you do not shriek at me like an old hag then you pretend you are ill. I do not believe you."

"Oh you insufferable rat! You are a heartless jackal, Mvezi, and I have half a mind to break our engagement. Do you know that?"

"You have been threatening to do so for six moons now, Oh Duduzile, and I am telling you again as I told you many times before—break our engagement and I shall break every bone in your vile little body. I dare you to break your promise."

He seized her left arm and twisted it behind her until she screamed aloud with pain, fear and anger. When he released her she spun around and struck him a stinging blow across the face. With a fierce oath Mvezi dropped his shield and spears and grappled with her. Like two infuriated wild cats the two young lovers fought, rolling over and over on the ground.

Duduzile seized a round stone and struck Mvezi savagely on the forehead with it. Mvezi retaliated by picking up a stump of wood and beating the girl black and purple. The angry girl tore the stump from Mvezi's hand and closed with him. Her hands clutching his neck, she tried her best to throttle him. The lovers exchanged blows until both were tired and short of breath. Finally Duduzile, who had taken the worst punishment, threw her arms around Mvezi's neck and kissed him tenderly on the forehead saying, "Do not hit me again, beloved one; you know I shall never break my promise . . ."

Mvezi sat down and drew Duduzile gently down beside him. The lovers kissed each other's foreheads twice—and then kissed each other full on the mouth. This is a thing reserved exclusively for married people. And then it is to serve one purpose only.*

"We should not have done that, my love," murmured Duduzile, suddenly feeling very tired. The persistent headache she had been feeling flared up

*The Laws of the Tribes forbid people to kiss on the mouth unless they are going to mate. Engaged couples may kiss each other's foreheads, noses and even necks. But they must not kiss on the mouth. The Bantu worship the love-kiss and regard it as very holy—not to be used in a trifling way; only in dead earnest. A man or a woman must never kiss a child on the mouth. Even when a man returns from a long journey, he must not kiss his wife on the mouth—only on her forehead or cheeks. The love-kiss is reserved only for mating and then only when the intention is to procreate children. When honey and beer are used to prevent conception, the married couple too, should not use the love-kiss. Such is the Second Law of the twenty-one High Laws in the 'Secret and Sacred Code of Love' among the Tribes.

blindingly and she felt hot all over. A strange fear tore through her as she found herself falling backwards. She did not know it, but the young man holding her was dead—and she was dying.

* * * * *

Nonsizi was walking beside the man she loved. She was feeling the ripple of the muscles of his strong arm as it drew her close to him. Her broad hip pressed his own muscular form and a strange hunger rose inside her as his fingers caressed the other hip. Her legs suddenly weakened.

She sat down in the long grass with a nervous giggle and Fanyana sat down beside her. His bulging bloodshot eyes were ablaze with adoration and love no words can describe. They spoke but little, these two ugly lovers—they were both shy and nervous in one another's presence. They kissed, they cuddled and caressed and were both alive with a ravening desire.

At last Nonsizi said very tiredly: "Hold . . . hold me tightly, Oh desired one. I . . . I feel . . . dizzy . . very strange . . ."

She was smiling and her long-lashed eyes fluttered coyly. She gave no indication of the blinding headache that was all but tearing her apart—a headache that had troubled her since the previous night. Fanyana continued to kiss and caress the doomed girl, even though he himself suddenly felt unwell. He suddenly found himself a victim of a blinding headache. But he gritted his teeth and tried to shrug it off. The Laws of the Tribes say it is very shameful for people to show that they are not able to bear pain cheerfully, and Fanyana smiled down at his sweetheart whose head was resting on his lap. She smiled back. Beads of salty perspiration erupted on the foreheads of both lovers. But still they continued to caress.

"Kiss me, Oh Fanyana," murmured Nosizi.

His arms tightened around her as he sought with his lips her sweat-bedewed neck through the red mist of pain swimming in his glazed eyes. She struggled up—their lips met . . .

It was their last kiss on earth. They died in one another's arms.

* * * * *

"I cannot believe it!" cried Gawula some time later as he stared down at the dead bodies of his younger brother Mvezi and his sweetheart Duduzile. "They are dead. But what . . . what could have killed them?"

"Don't you think they killed each other?" asked Zodwa in a horrified whisper. "Look, the grass has been flattened all round them and both are bruised all over."

"I do not know what to think. Come let us call out for the others. Somebody has to run back home and call our parents." the locust-ravaged forest for Fanyana and Nonsizi.

They called and called and no one answered. Then they began to search. It was Gawula who first saw the 'ugly lovers' lying dead in each other's arms. There was an expression of indescribable peace on their faces and their arms were tight around each other—their last embrace in a cruel world.

"Dead . . .," moaned Gawula. "They are dead—they are dead too . . .

Gawula and Zodwa lost their nerve and ran out of the forest at this shattering sight. They ran straight back to the sun-bathed lake, and found both Tandiwe and the tall thin Ntutana dead among the water-filled clay pots under the flat-topped munga tree.

"No! Oh no!" shrieked Zodwa. "Let us run home, Oh Gawula; let us go and call father and the other people. There is evil afoot . . . there is much evil!"

"I . . . I can't believe it," muttered Gawula, as both young lovers set out at speed for the distant village.

They entered the village at a run. There they found all the people either dead or dying. Men had died where they sat. The women had died where they worked. One had fallen into the great cooking fire in the centre of the kraal.

Zodwa and Gawula ran to the next kraal and found it burnt to the ground. The owner of that kraal had seen his wives and children drop dead one by one and had realised that a deadly epidemic had invaded his kraal, that he too, was as good as dead already. The brave man had remembered the demands of the law in such circumstances. He had carried his dead wives one by one into his hut, and the children one by one into their hut. He had first set fire to the children's hut and then to his own hut, which he had then entered himself.

Zodwa and her lover, Gawula, realised the truth at last. A pestilence of some unknown type was sweeping the land—a deadly epidemic that killed silently, swiftly and effectively. Before the blood-red sun sank wearily beyond the western mountains, Zodwa and Gawula had visited three kraals and four villages, finding nothing but dead, dying or unconscious people.

The two young lovers stood at last on the top of a scowling precipice, searching the distant horizon for a sign of life—a whisp of smoke from some far kraal, or a distant shout. Seeing neither the former nor hearing the latter, they realised that they were the last two persons alive in the eastern district of the land of the Nguni.

Ere thou wert born, He was close to thee,
And when thou diest He shall be by thy side;
Lackest thou then a protecting hand?
Peace—and surrender thee to Him.

Are not the stars of His creating?
Do not the beasts proclaim Him Father?
He is the One who careth for thee,
And thy footsteps He shall guide.

Let Him be thy hard Firestone
That lighteth thy path in Life's chill winter;
In Life's dark jungle He shall be thy axe
That hacketh thy lonely path for thee.

Let Him be thy sturdy helmsman,
Who guideth thy barge o'er the rapids of Life;
He—thy Star that adorneth the sky,
To guide thy footsteps to thy home.

Zodwa and Gawula are now in a cave among huge rocks. They have gone through a simple ceremony on their own and have proclaimed themselves man and wife. Zodwa has taken off her small calfskin skirt and presented it to Gawula on her knees, and Gawula has accepted it with both hands, also on his knees. The lovers have embraced fiercely, clinging to each other with a strength born of despair. Both are as good as dead already, and both know it all too well.

They are now man and wife, and they have no future. Zodwa is a fertile, hot-blooded woman who has always aimed at bearing the man of her choice no less than ten children. She had passed all the tests during her initiation with honour and had been very proud of this fact.

Now all her dreams are shattered. She will not live to see tomorrow's dawn.

Gawula is a young man whose heart has been broken again and again by cruel girls. By the time he met Zodwa he had lost all hope of ever being loved by a woman. Even as he kneels now, facing Zodwa, he remembers the strange words of Tambo, his famous grandfather, who was once the leading witchdoctor in the eastern district of the land of the Nguni. Old and wrinkled, Tambo had thrown the 'bones of divination' and had told Gawula in his toothless and cracked old voice:

"Listen, Oh son of my son, the bones of divination say that your heart will be broken many times by faithless girls. And on the day you find a woman who truly loves you death will be breathing down your neck."

Gawula had been puzzled by the old man's words on that bright mid-summer day so many years ago. And now he knows.

He has met the first woman who truly loved him, and by tomorrow he will be dead. Tears run down his lean cheeks and he wipes them savagely away with the back of his hand. A Nguni must not cry—and Gawula is a proud Nguni.

Zodwa's experienced hands are building a fire to roast the two hares Gawula has brought from the forest. The two lovers sit side by side, their arms about each other's shoulders, listening to the hissing of carcasses roasting in the fire. Outside, the frowning forest has assumed a more sinister shape with the coming of night and a distant jackal strikes up dismally, advertising a vacancy in his heart. The song of night has begun and its discordant verses assail the ear with countless sounds.

The last two lovers left alive in a plague-scourged land eat their last supper in trembling silence. The two participants in one of the strangest marriages of all time eat their wedding feast with no enjoyment. There are silent tears in their eyes and a creeping fear in their clouded hearts.

The dark, beautiful bride Death is close behind them, smiling softly. She has reaped a good harvest in this part of the land of the Nguni, and now only two little ears of corn await her basket. It will not be long now. In the darkness the beautiful bride Death smiles softly, almost pityingly.

The two young people have eaten and now recline on their love mat of green mopani leaves. The slow moon rises above the distant forest-veiled hills and a lonely owl hoots derisively from a branch of the tree directly outside the cave. A pack of marauding wild dogs yaps excitedly in the vale below.

"Come to me, my bride . . ." Gawula reaches out and draws Zodwa to him. But the woman pushes him away savagely and rolls off the leaf mat, out of reach. Gawula half-rises and seizes her again, crushing her to his chest almost brutally. A fierce struggle ensues in which the hot-blooded young people pit their strength against one another.

Zodwa writhes away like a snake and Gawula seizes her for the third time and pins her down mercilessly. Then with the skill of a well-initiated young man Gawula controls his own smothering passion and starts 'lighting the fire of love' in Zodwa by skilfully caressing her and occasionally kissing her fiercely. Zodwa still resists but she knows already that she has lost the battle. She is afraid and excited at the same time. Her mind begins to wander and she starts talking a lot of unintelligible nonsense.

She suddenly feels shy and afraid of Gawula and she closes her eyes tightly. To her great surprise she finds herself kissing him ardently.

She is calling him all sorts of names; she is calling him her fierce lion, her mighty elephant, her chief, her star in the sky. She is lost in a whirling mist of rainbow colours . . .

The two panting lovers draw deep breaths of the cool night air. For a long while they lie on their backs, revelling in the strange feeling sweeping over them—a feeling of peace and pleasant tiredness they wish would last forever.

At last Zodwa's eyes open and she sees the laughing moon huge in the sky outside the cave. Sharply silhouetted against its golden face, the fat owl is still hooting derisively at the world.

Zodwa turns on her side and caresses Gawula's muscle-corded belly. He turns too and takes her in his arms again. She says: "Hold me tighter, Oh beloved one, I am yours . . . all yours forever."

These are her last words. Outside the cave in which the two lovers are now lying, sleeping a sleep from which there is no awakening, the plump owl still sits on the branch of the lonely tree, ruffling his feathers and glaring malevolently at the midnight landscape with his large, frilled, smouldering eyes.

"Too-whooo-who . . . too-whoooo . . .," it hoots sombrely.

He was a 'drummer of honour' and he had a duty to perform ere he yielded to death. Everybody in his kraal was either dead or dying, but he, Liva, was still on his feet. His vision was already blurring with the throbbing headache and he knew he would not last till sunset. He had to send out a drum message; he had to before his strength failed. A wanderer—a dying wanderer from the east, whom Liva had admitted to his kraal two nights previously, had brought this vile, deadly contagion into his kraal and it was only a matter of time before the strange deadly plague depopulated the whole district.

"I must warn them," moaned Liva as he staggered towards the drum shrine—the little hut in which the sacred drums were kept and treasured for the ancient and sacred things they were. Liva crawled into the hut, his head heavy with pain, and rolled out the largest and oldest drum, which had stood untouched for more than fifty years. Heavily preserved with hippo fat, it stood there waiting for such an emergency.

Liva lifted the drum and slung it over his shoulder. He staggered out of the kraal he had built with his own hands so many years ago and which he loved. Wearily, painfully he climbed the steep hill that rose some distance away. He finally reached the summit, unslung the heavy drum and rested briefly. Slowly he stood up, tested the wind direction with his hand and, turning upwind, he gripped the heavy drum between his thighs and with his last ebbing strength he proceeded to beat out a short message over and over again: "Big Death . . . Abandon All Kraals . . ."

The terrible message boomed out of the bottom end of the drum. The howling wind carried the sound to the farthest mountains. Liva did not ease the beating until he heard another drum in the far distance taking up the message and relaying it.

He smiled happily and embraced the ancient drum. He laid it down and drew his sharp hunting knife. "A sacrifice to you, Oh Holy Drum of my Fathers." With these words he gritted his teeth and drove the knife into his chest. He sagged across the drum and died the death of a 'Drummer of Honour'. His blood stained the huge black drum on which was inscribed in holy symbols the history of the Nguni. An ugly vulture dived from the blue sky and for a moment its shadow fell over the dead drummer . . .

The trails and footpaths are thick with cattle and people fleeing westward and southward in their countless thousands—fleeing from a deadly unseen Death which carries off thousands every day. The epidemic has struck a cruel devastating blow at Man, but Man is now fighting back bravely.

As the people and their cattle flee westward they meet hard-faced warriors marching resolutely towards the east. These warriors are known as the 'Dedicates' and they are not going to return alive. Their strange mission is to seek out all kraals in which victims are lying dead and dying, and to burn these kraals to the ground.

Any member of the fleeing crowd falling a victim of the plague must immediately remain behind with all the members of his family. They are required by law to commit suicide or to wait for the 'Dedicates' to assist them if they lack the courage.

In other parts, if a man finds a wife or a child struck by the plague, he must immediately tie a large branch with green leaves across the entrance to his kraal to warn passers-by to keep clear and to attract the attention of the 'Dedicates'. It is from this custom of tying a green branch to the gate of a plague-afflicted kraal that the famous Bantu saying Kuvalwe nge hlahla sprang. It means 'a green branch closing the gate' and is used when a calamity—mostly an illness of some description—has fallen upon a kraal or a village.

The epidemic, or the 'Great Death' (as the Nguni now call it) is spreading with a shocking rapidity, sweeping across the northern, eastern and central parts of the land—sweeping these parts clean of human life with a mercilessness unparalleled in the history of the Tribes.

* * * * *

When the news of this terrible epidemic reached her, Celiwe of the Nguni ordered an immediate evacuation of all the kraals in the three remaining districts of her realm which were still unaffected. She ordered her warriors to seal off the borders of the districts to prevent the streams of refugees from the other districts entering the three districts. This was the most terrible decision of Celiwe's life and it is said that she wept bitterly as she made it. It was a terrible, but wise, decision and it saved more than three-quarters of the Nguni nation. Even so, more than twenty-five thousand refugees were left to their fate. Desperate refugees fought with the Nguni warriors who were barring their way. A great bitterness against Celiwe arose in the hearts of these refugees. They swore vengeance against her. They moved in another direction and formed themselves into a tribe apart from the Nguni and called themselves the Balahliwe—'the Forsaken Ones'.

Although these refugees did not know it at that time, Celiwe had followed what was destined to become one of the High Laws of all Tribes. All chiefs were henceforth expected to make such sacrifices to save the bulk of their people. Future generations were going to thank and remember Celiwe for her wisdom, however cruel it may in actual fact have been.

Meanwhile, a great exodus from the three unaffected districts of the land of the Nguni was in progress and countless thousands of people streamed over the border into the land of the Western Mambo. The last to leave was Celiwe herself, accompanied by her regiments from her military kraals. Malandela had to carry Celiwe forcibly across the border because she wanted to remain behind and die with the other refugees whose escape she had blocked.

The land of the Mambo became the last stronghold of humanity in central Africa against this most fantastic disease of all time. But not for long. The 'Great Death' entered the land of the Mambo from the west. It would appear that this strange contagion had broken out independently also in the land of the Lunda. After sweeping away more than four million people it had crept into the land of the Western Mambo from behind.

People were suddenly beginning to die in my own Royai Kraal. But we decided to make a stand. Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and I attacked the infernal pestilence with a foul-tasting medicine which people soon called 'Tokoloshe's urine'. We worked day and night brewing thousands of great clay pots full of this evil medicine. We forced the warriors, Indunas, servants and peasants, every man, woman and child to drink it. This medicine also turned out to be a strong purgative.

We launched a ruthless, savage battle against the unseen enemy. We snatched tens of thousands of victims from its talons. I sent entire companies of warriors out to every district with sleds loaded with giant pots full of my secret miracle medicine. They forcibly seized every human being they saw, including those half dead, and forced the medicine down their throats, liberally and indiscriminately.

* * * * *

Thus one day Mbewu the mighty hunter was standing at the gate of his new kraal staring absent-mindedly into the hazy distance, trying his best to ignore the throbbing headache with which he had woken up in the morning. And then, suddenly, he saw a group of heavily armed men working their way up the dusty footpath leading to his kraal. Behind these warriors came two oxen hauling a sled—a huge strongly built thing—carrying what appeared to be large shiny black cooking pots. Four young warrior boys walked beside the plodding oxen and a full platoon of a hundred warriors brought up the rear.

A huge round-shouldered Rainbow Induna, with a face that reminded Mbewu of an ape, led the procession—urging them with an angry purposefulness that struck fear into Mbewu's heart. Tetiwe, Mbewu's First Wife, came running out to join her husband at the gate. "Those are High Chief Lumukanda's warriors, Oh my husband," she whispered. "What do you think we could have done wrong?"

"I do not know, Oh beloved one," muttered the hunter. "I shall meet them and find out what they want."

Tetiwe watched as her tall husband strode down the slope to meet the warriors. She watched with fear-filled eyes and with both her hands hard on her mouth to stop herself from crying out aloud. "Great gods, what have we done . . . Lumukanda is such a strange and terrible cannibal. Oh my dear husband! Now what are they doing to you?"

After a brief conversation, which Tetiwe could not hear across the distance, the giant Rainbow Induna had knocked Mbewu flying to the ground with a huge fist. Four grinning warriors leapt on the fallen hunter and had pushed a huge enema horn into him. Mbewu yelled in outraged dignity and tried to shake off the fat warrior sitting comfortably on his back, while three warriors took turns in blowing the medicine through the wide end of the horn deeply into his bowels. Then, under the threat of a huge battle axe, Mbewu was turned over and forced to drink some of the foul liquid.

Tetiwe watched in shocked amazement as her husband got up after being released and ran like the wind into the bush, yelling and cursing at the top of his voice. The Rainbow Induna then came striding up the slope to the kraal.

"You, woman!" he roared. "Call out every man, woman and child . . ."

"Why . . . why . . ." stammered Tetiwe.

"Hurry," roared the Induna. Tetiwe sprang away to call her rival-in-marriage, Kikiza and the children. "Here!" bawled the Induna at the terrified group—two women, three boys and four girls—shoving to them a calabash full of the most foul-looking, foul-smelling and obviously foul-tasting medicine Tetiwe had ever seen. "Drink that in turns, you stupid fools."

"But we are not sick," protested Kikiza.

"Our venerable High Chief has declared everybody in this land sick. And when the chief says you are sick, you had better be sick!"

The women drank first, then the boys and last the girls. Murderous looking warriors kept a close watch to see that everyone actually swallowed the required amount. Then the Induna thundered: "Turn around, all of you, and bend over."

With many a sob and many a sniff the women and children surrendered to the remainder of the treatment. Thereafter the warriors moved to the next kraal, after the Rainbow Induna had added another pebble to those in his already nearly full pouch—each representing a family or a kraal saved from the terrible claws of the Great Death.

* * * * *

Ndawo, son of Vezi, was a thief and on this particular night he had a good reason for losing himself in the dark forest. He was driving eight brown cows before him and all of them were stolen. Ndawo had waited and planned for more than a year to steal these cows from the kraal of his fat, rich neighbour, Dumaza. Now he was taking them to his secret hiding place far away in the dark forest.

He was already dreaming of the fortune in copper ornaments, ivory and ebony utensils he was going to get from Mxhosa of the renegade Xhosa tribe in the south-west, in exchange for the eight fat cows. The wily old hyæna Mxhosa would haggle and fume and try to beat Ndawo down to a few bracelets for each cow. But as always, Ndawo—who was more than a match for Mxhosa in dishonesty and low cunning—would get his full price in the end.

"May the gods keep the Great Death out of Mxhosa's kraal until I have sold him these cows," muttered Ndawo with a greedy smile.

Then, out of the quiet night, an angry rasping voice bellowed: "You there, you with the cows, stop . . . in the name of the chief of the land!"

Ndawo saw dim forms moving towards him out of the frowning darkness. Warriors. Ndawo may have been a thief, but he was averse to hurting people because he did not like being hurt himself. He knew the punishment dictated by the High Laws for stealing cattle, and for this kind of punishment he had no particular liking. Few people would like to have a fire lit on their chests while staked to the ground like drying skins. And Ndawo's wish was to live to a ripe, if dishonest, old age.

So he turned and ran as fast as he could, trying to shake off the pursuing warriors. He ran as he had never run before. But his pursuers seemed to fly over the long grass and the distance between him and them grew horribly less and less.

Ndawo did not see the startled lovers in the grass until he tripped over them and went ploughing into the land. And before he could rise and resume his flight he and the startled couple were seized and frogmarched back into the forest.

"I am as good as dead already," muttered Ndawo. The young man next to him began to sob—the young woman had been doing nothing else since they were caught. This surprised Ndawo, until he discovered later that the woman was another man's wife . . .

The three were hustled into the centre of the camp the warriors had built for the night and an irritable Rainbow Induna gave them, to their great surprise, a bowl full of an evil-smelling fluid and told them in sharp terms to drink from it in turn. When told to turn around and bend over, Ndawo and his fellow-victims obeyed and tensed themselves for the pain of deadly spears. The enemas were pushed into them and their bellies croaked as they swelled from the cold medicine.

A few moments later, a very astonished cow thief and two equally astonished transgressors of the marriage laws were sworn and cursed on their way by the Induna.

Ndawo lost all interest in the stolen cows. His outraged belly dictated thus, and he was soon squatting behind a particularly unfriendly thorn bush. He did not know it just then, but with this strange experience a rather worthless life had been saved.

Thy yesterday—thy pale tomorrow—
Thy dark and uncertain present,
They are all clear to Him;
They are all in His Holy Hand.

Though thy foemen encompass thee,
 With whetted steel, seeking to slay;
 Though the unseen hyæna of woe
 Devours thy bleeding soul—yield to Him.

Though thy hut be the starry sky,
 The vagabond wind be thy blanket—
 Though for a lover thou hast but a dream,
 Trust in God and yield thee to him.

Though for thy food thou hast but the grass,
 And for thy fire the faint firefly;
 Though for thy loinskin thou hast but thy hand
 To shield thy shame from a staring world;
 And though thou hast weeds for a sleeping mat—
 Trust in God and yield thee to Him.

Six moons later we had won a decisive victory over the Great Death, not only in the land of the Mambo, but in the land of the Nguni as well. We snatched tens of thousands from the claws of death, but it had carried away more than we could save. The last traces of this disease we swept out of the land of the Xhosa.

People started drifting back to the depopulated areas, trying to bring back life to the desolate country. A slow, painful task of rebuilding began. The large herds of ownerless cattle were equally distributed amongst the people.

But we survived one battle only to fight another. And the latter was more terrible than the first. The pestilence-ridden and sun-blasted summer had worn on to late summer, and on into winter. It was soon early summer once more and before we knew the second moon of early summer had passed. And in all this time an angry sun blistered the cringing earth most mercilessly.

Grain fields ceased to exist. Cattle died by the hundreds. The Jackal of Starvation was howling outside every gate in the land.

THE GREAT JOURNEY BEGINS

THE Hand of Death is heavy upon the land and people are dying like flies in the Milk-pail of Famine. There is no food; even the leaves of trees in the forests are too dry for human consumption. In the great kraals the people are dying the most terrible death any creature can die. They fade into hollow-eyed skeletons, hardly able to move. They look like things dead, and yet they move. They look like the dessicated bodies of long dead Bushmen on the dry sands of the ageless Ka-Lahari. Their teeth protrude in hideous grins; their thin necks make their heads look very big.

Inside these heads brains are also shrinking, not in volume, but in normal mental capacity. Men, women and children resort to doing strange things, and these should not be seen—least of all be remembered. Yet many are the unsavoury incidents destined to be brought back to memory for many generations to come. Let us take a brief look at one such example and quickly pass over this dark phase in the History of the Tribes. Let us try to forget . . .

The two youngsters are waiting and watching with great impatience as their mother slowly dies. Their beady, sunken eyes are alive with a hideous, insane animal fire. Now and again they lick their hunger-cracked lips and glance furtively at each other. They are sitting with their bony knees drawn up and their thin shoulders hunched. They look like two large dark-brown bats—like two demons from the deepest pits of hell . . . waiting . . .

These two youngsters, Dedani and Baningi, are no longer human; they are not normal animals. They are insane beasts from the cesspools of the Underworld. Ten days ago they had their last bite of food. Their mother sacrificed their baby brother, Velapi. They have not eaten since . . .

And now Dedani and Baningi are waiting for their mother to die so that they could eat again. But Dedani's patience is suddenly drowned in a frenzy of madness. Summoning all his strength he reaches for his long dead father's battle axe . . .

* * * * *

For many days after this, Dedani and Baningi had food on hand, and they slowly regained their strength in a region entirely depopulated by the famine.

Nearly a month later they left the kraal and ventured out into an environment reigned by vultures in the day and by hyænas in the night. For days they walked, sleeping in caves or treetops. One day they passed a kraal perched on a grassy hilltop and were spotted by a tall skeletal man who stood at the gate. His starvation-dimmed eyes widened as he saw the two youngsters, and his mind spoke through his cracked lips the one word "Food!"

Three naked and emaciated women crawled out of one hut when they heard this magic word. They saw their husband stagger out of the kraal after something that was apparently edible, and they felt strength—strength born of despair—flood their wasted bodies. They must help their husband. The four moving skeletons ran down the bush-dotted hillside towards the two children—fourteen-year-old Dedani and his sister Banengi of twelve summers. The two youngsters saw what was coming their way, and they took to their heels.

With his longer legs the tall man closed in on Dedani. But he stooped, picked up a stone and hurled it straight and true at Dedani's head. The boy went down screaming while his sister streaked away for the shelter of the distant forest. Dedani tried to struggle to his feet. But the man and his shrivelled wives threw themselves on him . . .

Banengi ran on and on, running until she could run no more. The sun was setting when she stumbled over a fallen tree and crashed headlong into a pit barely covered by the grass growing over it.

She remained in the pit until the following day. Towards midday she heard the shuffling of many feet in the grass above, a murmur of many listless voices. A group of ten boys was hunting tiredly through the forest for something to eat. A dead animal they thought would do, even a dead man.

Banengi did not know this and she made the last mistake of her life. She cried out for help. They did help her out but they brushed aside her whispered thanks. A little while later a brisk fire was burning . . .

* * * * *

Those were strange days in the history of the land—those days of the Great Famine. The Lunda tribe, which held a vast empire in the west, consumed their Emperor, all his wives and Indunas. Men ate their wives and children ate their parents. Lovers no longer took each other to the love mat, but to the meat tray.

Men fought with vultures and hyænas for carcasses of oxen many days dead. Whole families settled around such carcasses eating away like mad — assuring all and sundry that they were eating the meat and what crawled inside, not the smell from it.

* * * * *

People now realized why I had built my huge granaries, and they began to praise me where they had insulted me before. I was no longer the mad Wizard; I was transformed into Lumukanda the Father of the People.

Starving thousands from as far as the land of the Lunda in the west, the Nyanja and Kikuyu in the north and the Lukondi in the east (those that the slave-raiders overlooked), converged on the land of the Mambo and Nguni where they had heard that a Great Father named Lumukanda had corn and dried locusts with which to feed them. I heavily reinforced the regiments guarding the granaries. I sent out other units to hunt elephant and buffalo, and even rhinoceros. I sent out warriors to fish. And for six whole moons I fed the gods alone know how many thousands of mouths besides those of my own people.

People had become too weak to hunt for themselves. Many just lay down and died. There was death everywhere, in spite of the provision we made, and the cruel drought showed no signs of abating.

The Great Famine killed more people than the Great Death and it caused more misery to the Tribes than anything that ever happened before or was to happen afterwards. I made my wives and concubines work day and night stewing locusts and sorghums for the hungry thousands who clamoured daily for food outside the gates of my kraal. They begged in ten different tongues: "Give us food, Oh Great Father Lumukanda!"

I gave it to them—I gave bowls of steaming sorghum and meat broth to those naked, pathetic scarecrows—men wasted into shrivelled skeletons covered with taut skins; women once creatures of beauty turned into dessicated nightmares, nursing babies at their empty breasts—babies which looked like skinned dried hares. I gave them food and they ate like the starving animals they were; they ate and licked the bowls clean, and not a few devoured the gourd bowls.

One of my two thousand wives was eaten by a mob of Nguni starvelings for whom she was dishing out food. They ate her, all the food in the pots and the giant wooden stirring spoons as well. I was greatly annoyed by this—she was quite a lovely little wife—and for two days I closed down the food distribution in my ten kraals and told the clamouring multitudes outside my kraal to go and milk a zebra, or jump in the Zambezi and drown themselves.

And this they did. The strength of my voodoo personality combined with their diminished mental faculties induced more than eight thousand of them actually to jump in the Zambezi and drown themselves. I was bitterly sorry for what I had said to them. On the following morning I re-opened the food distributing, and this time my wives and concubines were guarded by heavily armed warriors to avoid further accidents.

Some months later a band of hunger-maddened Lunda tribesmen got themselves killed trying to raid one of my granaries, and before my warriors could bury them a band of mixed Nguni and Nyanja descended upon them and left only their bones to bleach in the sun.

The Great Famine raged for one whole year and eight moons, and the food in my granaries sank lower and lower. Then at last we decided to do something about it. It was already early summer, and rainless, and the land was not green, but a dead, brittle brown. The tall trees stood leafless and naked in the blistering heat and the ground underfoot was as hot as a spear heated in a forge. No birds sang in the silent forests; there was death under every bush. Here and there in the long grass piles of bones lay bleaching whitely in the dazzling sunlight—bones of whole herds of zebra, impala and other wild animals that had perished from hunger in the forests.

Along a faint and long-disused footpath there came a man and three women. The man was huge and his shoulders were round and stooped, while he walked as if all the cares in the world were resting upon them. His hair and beard were a mixture of grey and black and his eyes deepset under a wide and care-lined forehead. He wore no ornaments and his loinskin was of cheetah skin trimmed with black sable antelope—the loinskin of a High Chief.

The woman immediately behind him was a tall, wide-shouldered and broad-hipped giantess whose skin was as black as polished ebony and whose fiercely out-thrust breasts seemed to cry defiance at eternity. Her beauty was a beauty which was not of this earth and the perfection of her figure did not speak of a cruel world. She was a creature who belonged to the plains of the Forever Land, where only High Gods dwell in places of pure crystal.

She walked with the assurance of a female who is over-conscious of her beauty.

The second woman looked more human, but still in an intensely beautiful way. She was human—and yet, somehow she was not quite human. She reflected the smouldering beauty of a midsummer moon. Her skin was a rich golden brown and her eyes were so dark brown as to be almost black. Her face was beautiful in a soft, delicate way that made her look like a fragile toy of exquisite workmanship. The perfection of her physique was that of the tribal ideal; it was the beauty which tribal elders dream about but rarely see in this world.

The third woman was, unlike the first two, of medium height and while the first two were obviously Bantu, she stood out conspicuously as a foreigner. It was easy to recognize that she was a half-caste—a daughter of Bantu-Arabi parentage. Her skin was very light and her hair fuzzy and soft, with a glossy sheen to it. Her round forehead and full-lipped mouth were her only Bantu features; her straight thin nose and high arching eyebrows were her most alien characteristics. The beauty of her face was the beauty of a very earthly harlot and she walked with a gait aimed at attracting men.

All three women were dressed alike in black calfskin skirts reaching to just below the knees and decorated with cowrie shells and large copper beads. Such skirts are worn only by the High Wives of a High Chief.

These four people were myself, Lumukanda, and my three wives Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and Lulama-Maneruana. We were on our way to the Madlonti mountains to ask the Highest of the Most High to save the Tribes from death by starvation.

* * * * *

We are now on the highest summit in the timeless Madlonti range and I look down on a devastated land. Down there in those brown, lifeless plains and ravished forests, thousands of men, women and children are dying. Tens of thousands of cattle are dead and no young are being born to men or to beasts. The Land of the Tribes, from as far north as the Masai to as far south as the Mashona, is in the grip of death. The cruel gods have turned their backs on mankind and are slowly but surely bringing about the extinction of the descendants of Odu and Amarava.

We kneel down on the hard rock. We bow our heads low and our souls reach out beyond the farthest frontiers of Eternity—to the presence of the Highest of the Most High who sees all and knows all.

“Your mercy, Oh God!” whispers Vuramuinda. “Your mercy, Oh Highest of the Most High.”

And the ringing silver voice of Noliyanda strikes up with the Song of the Suppliant:

Lord of the Eternal Land,
Father of the Stream of Time—
Thou in whose almighty Hands
Rests the future of all mankind.

Thou upon whose Mighty Hands,
Our lives' paths are clearly traced;
Father of all the Ages—
Hear us now—we pray to Thee.

From the cruelty of Ninavanh-Ma,
From the dreaded arrows of Shimbi,
From the bolts of Duma-Kude,
And the wolves of Nomkubulwana—
Shield, Oh God, the human race
From the claws of darkest plague—
From the jaws of hunger-death,
From the evil eyes of Kufa,
And Ka-Lunga's grasping hands,
Lord of all the far-off stars,
Save—Oh save the Human Race.

Lo! on earth the dark vile demons,
Make a mockery of Thy name;
Lo! the gods that know no mercy,
Dare to harm Thy helpless souls.

From the cruelty of Ninavanh-Ma,
From the bolts of Duma-Kude,
From the keen arrows of Shimbi—
Save, oh save the sons of men!

We all concentrate our minds, giving God a clear picture of what we have come to lay before Him. I imagine rain falling on the parched country—great and extensive showers bringing relief to the devastated land. In her mind, Vuramuinda has a clear picture of corn growing, trees turning green and cattle grazing in lush pastures. Noliyanda imagines people of many tribes eating—happy children playing near baskets overloaded with corn. She imagines peace, plenty and happiness all over the land.

Our mind pictures and unspoken prayers float up like lost feathers to the Feet of the Highest of the Most High. He sees them and accepts them. And then it is as though we hear His Voice:

"My lost children, your prayers are granted. Even today rain will fall over the whole land, and it will carry on for five days. There shall be plenty of food in the land once again. But listen carefully: I command you to take the Mambo and the Nguni tribes, and all the other tribes now in your land, and go to the south. Go beyond the Limpopoma. This is not, as you believe, the southern frontier of the earth. You must spread, multiply and grow strong, to meet what lies ahead. This will be a perilous journey, the greatest and longest of all time. This journey will be full of woes and surprises. Leave as soon as your people have recovered their strength."

* * * * *

For a long time we remained kneeling on the windswept mountain top, tears of gratitude streaming down our cheeks and a pleasure most profound pulsing through our hearts. Our people were saved—our land was saved.

Far away in the south-east a cloud appeared above the dim horizon. Another and yet another—a whole regiment of rain-pregnant clouds soon gathered in the distant skies and some time later we heard the rumble of thunder. The land was saved.

Slowly the frowning clouds crept across the skies and came overhead, shielding the sun. The earth breathed a sigh of relief. As we made our way down the mountainside the sky grew darker and soon it turned so black that we feared the presence of Kalunga, the double-sexed god from hell. The hot wind died down and an expectant silence fell upon the earth.

There came a dazzling flash of forked lightning which briefly illuminated the mountainside with a purplish light and was quickly followed by a brazen peal of thunder that shook the earth under our feet. Flash followed flash, tearing the frowning skies apart. Peal after peal shook the mighty mountains. Great eagles left their nests among the crags and chased each other in dizzy circles high in the scowling heavens, revelling in the stormy turbulence.

"We might as well make ourselves at home here, my Lord," said Lulama-Maneruana with a nervous smile, pointing to a cave shortly below us. "I shall make a fire."

"It is my duty as First Wife to make a fire for my husband," said Noliyanda throatily. "Remember that, you foreign harlot!"

"There is someone who would like to dispute that claim," hissed Vuramuinda venomously. "I am Lumukanda's First Wife, and remember that, you glorified puppet!"

"My sisters-in-marriage, I beg you, please. Respect the presence of our lord and husband. Go and brawl elsewhere."

"Let them fight to their hearts' content, Lulama," I said. "The honour of making a fire for me falls into your hands."

"Thank you, my Lord—your handmaiden is honoured."

Quickly Lulama built and lit a roaring fire in the cave, warming and lighting the interior. Vuramuinda and Noliyanda stopped their fighting and both came to sit near the fire with eyes downcast.

Some time later there was movement in the mouth of the cave and a low, husky voice said: "Neither of you is this man's First Wife; it happens to be my privilege."

We turned and stared with widening eyes at the apparition that stood tall and beautiful in the entrance of the cave. I recognised her in spite of her efforts to shield her identity behind a large black kaross, and I sensed an expression of incredible dejection on her face. There was a terrible flash of lightning, and I remembered no more . . .

* * * * *

*O irreki hamaresi—
E, anazueru!
Thaite marhevi anakeberu!
Ouzarauena ahité Bakeri—
Thaite areri amakharabethi
O, yrreck hamaresi i ana Zueru!*

The strange song—the 'Song of the Gods' in spirit language—rang through my brain again and again as I slowly opened my eyes. Who was I? What was I doing lying on my back between two rocks? Above me the sun was shining and a few clouds were drifting in the blue skies yonder. The ground was wet as though it had rained during the night.

Suddenly a girl emerged from behind one of the two great rocks between which I was lying. She was an alien-looking girl about twenty years old, with a very light, reddish-yellow skin and a shock of fuzzy hair with a glossy, sheen in it. She was wearing a skirt made of green leaves and there was a frightened look in her dark eyes. She stood for a few moments looking down at me and then her hand went to her mouth to stifle an involuntary cry:

"Lumukanda, my Lord!" she cried at last. "So . . . so it has happened to you too!"

"Lumukanda?" I asked. "Who is Lumukanda?"

The girl's eyes widened and she came nearer and knelt on one knee beside me. "You are Lumukanda, my Lord. That . . . that is your name. I am Lulama-Maneruana, but both of us . . . have changed. I can hardly believe it!"

"Young girl," I asked, "just what are you talking about? You say we have changed, and that you are called Lulama-Maneruana. To me you are a stranger . . . I have never seen you before."

"Don't you remember me, my Lord? I am Lulama, your Royal concubine. We went up to the top of this mountain a moon ago, you, Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and myself. We went up there to pray for rain and rain came. We took shelter in a cave. And then that Goddess came . . ."

Even as she spoke, memory returned to me like the sun breaking through the clouds after a thunderstorm.

"You say we went up this mountain a moon ago? Do you mean I have been lying here for a moon?"

"More than a moon, my Lord. I have been looking for you for more than a moon now. But yesterday I saw you lying down here—this is the bottom of a precipice. But I did not know how to get down to rescue you. This morning I succeeded, and here I am."

"I honour you, Maneruana. But why is it that you look much younger? Why, you are just a child!"

"My Lord, you would be even more surprised if you could see yourself. You have changed too, my Lord. You look like a boy of twenty-five."

"What!" I cried, sitting up with a jerk.

"Yes, my Lord, had it not been for the moon-shaped birthmark above your left breast and for the star-shaped scar of immortality between your eyes I myself would not have known it was you."

"What happened to us, Maneruana? And where are Vuramuinda and Noliyanda?"

"You will never see them again, my Lord. I do not know just what happened. But I have a very strong feeling that you will never see them again. A strange blinding light exploded in the cave. I was hurled outside and into a clump of thick mfomfo shrubs. When I regained consciousness a great fire, fantastically bright, was burning in the crater where the cave had been. Then, my Lord, I saw a dark figure rising slowly out of the flames: it was the figure of a woman. This figure rose higher and higher and I saw sparks flying off her body as she floated out. Afterwards she went to sit on a stone—for a long time. Dawn came and she was still sitting there, and I was still hiding in the clump of bushes. And, my Lord, as the sun rose she also stood up. But I have never seen a creature so beautiful. She was like Vuramuinda, Noliyanda and the goddess Ma combined. My Lord, she came straight to where I was lying, as if she had known all along that I was there; she stood over me in all her naked beauty. She looked down at me and said: 'Tell Lumukanda when you find him that Ma-Ouzarauena awaits his pleasure in the Royal Kraal'. My Lord, I was terrified. Her eyes looked upon me with a cold pity and seemed to be alive with all the forbidden knowledge of the Universe."

"Where is she now?"

"She is in the Great Kraal, my Lord; she is ruling the Mambo and she has had your grain fields ploughed and corn sown. Soon there shall be plenty of food under the good rains of the past moon. She told the people that you had gone to the Land of the Gods to drink from the fountain of youth and that she, your new Goddess Queen, would rule the Mambo until you came back."

"I honour you, Maneruana. I honour you again and yet again."

* * * * *

The warriors are very angry; to them I am the biggest liar in all creation. They believe so and they say as much. "You beggardly knave, you are not the Lost Immortal. For the last time, tell us the truth: what do you want here?"

"I am telling you lame-brained sons of dogs that I am Lumukanda, the chief of this kraal!"

Once again the Battle Leader Mandla draws back his powerful arm and plants a heavy fist on my nose. "If you said you were a flying elephant we would believe you, pretty boy!" he snarls viciously. "Try another lie; this one you persist in telling is now tarnished. What do you want here?"

"Listen to me, you son of a hyæna—if you do not believe I am Lumukanda, then go and call someone who will recognise me. Call one of the Rainbow Indunas."

A tall girl with one hand missing comes striding along the path between the huts. It is my eldest daughter, Luanaledi, and Mandla bows low before saying, "Great Princess, we have here a mad youth who claims he is your father. He has persisted in this, in spite of the thrashing we have given him."

Luanaledi's cold dark eyes sweep me from head to foot. She extends her long-fingered, right hand and touches the scar between my eyes. And slowly she says: "Do not lie to me, young man, you are no more my father than I am a crocodile's cousin."

"Do not be a fool girl—I am your father, Lumukanda."

"I have known my dear father for countless years, and you are not he. Take this beggar away and imprison him in a hut until Ma-Ouzarauena comes back in a few days' time."

* * * * *

For three whole days they held me prisoner in an empty hut in my own Great Kraal. Then, on the night of the fourth day, I had a visitor who crept stealthily into the hut and quickly closed the wickerwork door.

"Who are you?" I demanded.

"It is I, the Princess Luanaledi," answered the visitor.

"Do you now believe that I am your father?"

"There is no need to keep up this deception, strange one," she replied. "I do not believe you and nobody in this kraal believes you. I have come to help you escape, beloved one."

* * * * *

It is midnight and in the ebony skies the stars shine like so many lost sunstones. The great constellations stand out against the starry tumult—the Three Healers, the Virgin's Fire and the Stars of Planting are directly overhead. The River of Stars spans the heavens from horizon to horizon—cold, glittering, utterly remote.

"I do not believe you," says Luanaledi for the fiftieth time.

I see the tears that flow down her cheeks. I hear her heartrending sobbing.

Beside me I hear a shuddering sigh burst from the reddish lips of Maneruana. Far down the ancient mountain in the night-shrouded forests a hyæna laughs hideously.

Lulama-Maneruana leans forward and addresses the girl beyond the dancing fire. On the walls of the cave time-dimmed figures of men and beasts drawn by Bushmen, stand out against the grey granite. "Princess Luanaledi, you simply must believe us. This is your father and I am his Royal concubine, Lulama-Maneruana."

The one-handed girl beyond the fire shakes her head violently. She leaps to her feet, her eyes blazing. She tears off her 'virgin's mutsha' and flings it savagely at my feet. Her light-brown face is black with rage. "You keep on telling me you are Lumukanda, my father. You are not! All you want is to deny yourself to me, knowing fully that I love you. You want to break my heart and I can assure you, you will not! As an immortal I can will myself to death if I so wish. And if you do not promise me here and now to take me as your wife, stranger, I shall will myself to death—and you will have a lot to explain to the Rainbow Indunas when they find my body here. I give you twenty heartbeats in which to make up your mind, stranger."

"Give me more than that," I plead. "Give me six moons in which to think it over. Do not destroy yourself."

"Good, I give you exactly six moons. The daughter of Lumukanda can afford to wait. Give me your word that you will not try to run away in the meantime . . ."

"You can see the star of immortality on my forehead, Luanaledi. I swear by it that I shall not run away. I give you my word as one immortal to another."

"I accept your word, beloved. Now stop calling yourself Lumukanda. I shall call you Lishati-Shumba, the Lion of the Sun. That is the name I give you, handsome youth."

Lulama-Maneruana begins to cry . . .

* * * * *

We are back in the Great Kraal. We have been tracked down and captured. We are kneeling outside the Royal Hut, surrounded by scowling Rainbow Indunas. We are waiting for the great Ma-Ouzarauena to appear.

Above us the sun lags on towards midday. I am waiting with great impatience for Ma-Ouzarauena to convince the people that I am their High Chief Lumukanda. She is my only salvation now. I can hardly wait to meet her.

The Rainbow Indunas fall flat on their faces as Ma-Ouzarauena emerges from her hut. The warriors also prostrate themselves before the Goddess Queen's dread presence.

She is beautiful—yet she is terrible to behold. She looks like the silvery Goddess Ninavanhuma—and yet she is not Ma. She looks like Vuramuinda, and like Noliyanda, and yet she is neither . . .

The awful thought strikes me with a thundering blow. This—this frightening immortal—is in fact a combination of all three. She is all three immortals fused into one. Could it be that this one being now combines the powers of all three?

Ma-Ouzarauena asks coldly: "Is this the boy who claims to be Lumukanda?"

"It is, Oh Great One," says Rainbow Induna Nsongololo. "The young one must be mad."

"Shall we execute the - - - - - son of a hyæna, Great Queen," asks Mavimbela.

"No," she replies. "I want both him and the girl who claims to be Lulama-Maneruana whipped soundly and then made to work in my hut. I want them to be my slaves."

She turns away and I can swear there is a cruel smile on her face.

We are dragged away and tied to posts. They whip us in spite of protests from my daughters, Luanaledi and Mbaliyamswira—who still do not believe I am their father.

Lulama-Maneruana is whipped into unconsciousness. They release her and revive her with cold water. I am also released and we are both told to report to the Royal Hut for duties.

* * * * *

While we are busy sweeping Ma-Ouzarauena's hut she crawls into the small entrance and faces me with hands on her hips, and a smile on her face. "I see you, Lumukanda . . . how do you enjoy being a slave?"

"Why are you doing this to us?" asks Lulama-Maneruana. "You alone know who we are. The other people do not believe us. What do you hope to gain by making us suffer?"

"Revenge . . . the sweetest thing in creation!" laughs Ouzarauena. "I am enjoying my revenge on Lumukanda. Inside this body are three separate souls. But you can look upon me as the Goddess Ninavanhu-Ma because my soul exercises control over those of Vuramuinda and Noliyanda. And I do not have to remind you, poor half-caste, that Lumukanda humiliated me; he rejected me who gave him immortality more than two thousand years ago. He dared to scorn me, his real First Wife. I shall reinstate you on one condition, Lumukanda, and enlighten those love-struck daughters of yours."

"What is that condition?"

"Take me back as your First Wife."

"You can go and milk a moth-eaten, flea-infested zebra. I do not want you, no matter in what guise."

"I shall make you suffer, Oh Lumukanda. I shall make you regret your attitude towards me."

"Go on, do your worst; I am not afraid."

* * * * *

The moons rolled by and soon it was harvest time. Thousands of women went out into the great cornfields with mpangas and flails. The Great Famine was now something of the past, like its predecessor the Great Death, and the time for the long journey south was drawing nigh. Lulama-Maneruana and I were still slaves; we were beaten up, sworn at and we worked from dawn to dusk in the hut of Ma-Ouzarauena.

My greatest task now was to keep avoiding Luanaledi who was still pressing me to elope with her. I had to play for time. I must fulfil my mission to lead the tribes beyond the Zambezi and the Limpopoma, as commanded by the Great Spirit. I must first do this and settle my personal problems afterwards.

Celiwe of the Nguni, Mxhosa of the Amaxhosa and Ma-Ouzarauena of the Mambo sent messengers to all parts of the lands which they ruled. The messages were curt and to the point—every man, woman and child was to assemble on the northern bank of the Zambezi river as soon as harvesting has been completed.

Every man must bring his family, cattle and goats, and all the grain from his fields to the 'place of assembly'. But people do not just pack their belongings and burn their kraals when they leave the land they have inhabited for generations. The moving of a nation, a tribe, even a clan, must be accomplished in accordance with the law. Each family must dig up its burial grounds and exhume as many of the ancestors' skulls as possible. These skulls must be packed in large grass baskets and reburied in the land where that family or clan settles with full rituals of burial. Those who cannot find remains in the graves of their ancestors must scoop up some of the earth and pack that in the baskets. This is important because the people must not lose their contact with their ancestors. In their distant places of abode their ancestors must continue to keep an eye on them and guide them.

Any tribe that fails to take its ancestors' skulls to a new land is cursed forever and might as well commit mass suicide, or disperse and be absorbed by other tribes. This is the most shameful thing to happen to any tribe.

No chief, no matter how tyrannical, will ever force a tribe to move without first letting the people exhume their ancestors. A ruler who fails to comply with this requirement is declared an outlaw and killing him becomes a matter of honour to any man who might get the opportunity.

Many were the 'dances of farewell'; many were the sacrifices; many were the 'ceremonies of departure' performed in the valleys and among the hills. There were tears, there was doubt and fear; the Journey to Asazi, the journey to 'we know not where', was about to begin.

The people and their cattle have assembled in their millions. The land is a seething black mass of humanity and domesticated animals for as far as the eye could see, stretching over hills and vales beyond the horizon in all directions. A tall, beautiful woman is standing on the very summit of a high hill overlooking the plains of assembly. In one hand she holds a great horn bugle and this she raises to her lips and blows with all her might. Thus Ma-Ouzarauena signals the start of the greatest exodus the world has ever known. Hardly have the moaning notes of the great horn bugle vanished into the misty distance when the great masses of people and animals start moving slowly westward to a section of the Zambezi where that mighty river narrows as it flows through a gorge, known hereafter as the Sacred Gorge of Kariba, to become famous in song and legend as the holiest place under the sun.

Ma-Ouzarauena slowly makes her way down the hillside to where Lulama-Maneruana and I are standing. "Attend me, slaves!" she commands coldly as we follow her. The Journey to Asazi has begun.

GANDAYA THE ELEPHANT

IT was fast approaching midday and Ilanga, the God of Day, shone brightly from a pale sky on whose expanse not a single cloud was to be seen. A perfumed breeze caressed the verdant earth, making warm and pleasant a day which would otherwise have been unbearably hot. The same whispering breeze touched the great pool in the bosom of the murmuring forest, raising tiny ripples on its cool, greenish-blue surface. On the edge of this great, reed-bordered pool a vast herd of zebra and impala gambolled and drank, watched over by a huge old wildebeest.

The wildebeest was old, a scarred veteran of many a savage battle. The tip of one of his forward-curving horns had been broken off quite recently in the only battle that the old bull had lost to a younger bull, in his hoary twenty years of earthly life. A composite feeling—part anger and partly injured pride—flooded old One Horn as he remembered the battle of a month ago, the battle which resulted in his being expelled in disgrace from his place at the head of his herd—driven away by one of his own sons.

A tremor ran along his powerful flanks and a mist of sorrow crept into his eyes. His vision, already blurred by age, grew dimmer. An itchy feeling in his eyes caused him to blink angrily and to twitch his tail irritably.

‘Such is life,’ thought old One Horn. ‘The one son you love is the one that overthrows you in the end . . .’ Old One Horn turned and swept the mixed zebra-impala herds with his brownish-red, fatherly eyes. He saw the strutting impala rams with heads held high and graceful spiralling horns shining like polished ebony in the sunlight. He saw the shy impala does, with their dark, innocent eyes and their shiny, reddish-brown, fawn and white coats that were a shade lighter than those of the rams.

He saw the fat, seemingly clumsy, yet fleet-footed, zebras with their many stripes and dark-brown noses; the males, females and frolicking foals which gambolled about their mothers in the long grass.

‘Life,’ thought old One Horn, ‘is a beautiful and amazing thing, sometimes at least. There are times, however . . .’

Suddenly an unpleasantly familiar odour assailed his quivering nostrils. There was no mistaking the evil, acrid stench of these hated carnivores. Suddenly the forest held no beauty for the old warrior. He tossed his massive head as though to shake off the skulking, clawing nightmare and the zebra patriarch saw the signal. He let out the warning call that the murmuring forests know so well. This call means ‘lion’ in both zebra and impala language, and with incredible speed and grace, the animal herds erupted into motion. There was a drumming roar from more than a thousand zebra hooves. Dust rose in clouds of billowing disorder among the flat-topped munga trees, and the fleet impalas shot like arrows into the safety of the dense forests.

Old One Horn saw two lionesses burst forth from the bush and bring down a beautiful striped female which had a foal running beside it. One lioness sank her teeth into the zebra's nose, depriving it of breath, while the other leapt on to its back. The orphaned foal raced away and was lost in the billowing dust.

A huge maned lion, with one eye clawed out in a fierce battle some time earlier, brought down a zebra running just ahead of old One Horn. The thundering herds had dashed into a cleverly laid lion trap and they now veered away with old One Horn in the lead—away from the scene of the ambush. But the lions had not finished yet. A young lion made the mistake of trying to leap upon a racing zebra from behind. There was a vicious snarl on his face and his eyes were narrowed into points of blazing yellow malevolence. He leapt, yes, but the zebra lashed out with both hind legs, and hit him in mid-air. Old One Horn heard a loud cracking thud and saw the golden lion go sailing to one side with his lower jaw smashed to a bloody pulp.

A huge lioness exploded from behind a bush with a blood-chilling snarl straight at the head of the racing old wildebeest. Old One Horn crashed into her and his one remaining horn sank full into her chest, knocking her back into the spot from where she had sprung. Before she could recover she was stampeded into a pulp by the whole herd of zebras.

Old One Horn led the zebra herd towards the Zambezi at a devastating dust-shrouded gallop and they halted only when they reached the dense, impassable forests bordering the river. They stopped to graze once more, and to rub their itchy hides against the rough tree trunks with contented snorts. For old One Horn and his friends life turned beautiful once more.

Then there came a crashing, splintering sound from the forest and each zebra jerked up its head, ready to turn and run once again. The cracking sound of breaking trees and shattering branches came to old One Horn's ears and finally the largest elephant that ever walked the earth crashed into view on its way to the river.

Old One Horn had seen this terrible monarch of the wilds many times, and so had his father and father's father. This dreaded dweller in the gorge was Gandaya the Trampler who guarded not only the vast herds of elephants in the Kariba Gorge, but, if legend could be right—which it often is—also a 'Shining One' named Luamerava the Pure. This apparition was known throughout the land of the tribes by name, but had never been seen. Luamerava was said to be the last of the Children of the Star whom the Holy Legends say were born from that Lost Star which shone at midday. Chiefs from as far away as the land of the Ba-Kongo had tried in vain for thousands of years to penetrate the Gorge of the Virgin (Kariba) to capture Luamerava, because it was said that the chief who caught the Desire of Kariba would not only live to the end of time, but would rule the very stars when that great event called the 'Transformation of Humanity' came in some thousands of years in the future.

Many great chiefs had perished trying to secure this legendary female—amongst them Lubo, who had founded the Lunda nation more than a thousand years previously.

Many doubted the very existence of Luamerava and contemptuously called her the Illusion of Kariba. The elephant Gandaya was said to be one of Luamerava's guards, among whom there were also the tailless Star Lion and the Black Python.

Gandaya reached the Zambezi almost at the same time as a large herd of normal elephants. It was not long before the great river, which had been sparkling in the midday sun, was reduced to a muddy yellow by the wallowing of the fifty clumsy brutes. Gandaya bathed all by himself in aloof dignity—a huge, dark-grey monster reputed to have been four times the size of an ordinary big bull elephant.

Gandaya had a white star-shaped scar on his broad, wrinkled forehead and in one of his hind legs was buried an old rusty spearhead which a slave-raiding Arabi had driven into it more than fifty years earlier. It still gave the colossal beast much pain and made him hate all human beings with a hatred that was all-devouring. The faintest scent of humanity was enough to send Gandaya into a murderous frenzy. His great forelegs had trampled many men to death since he was wounded, but he wanted to kill more—many more.

An elephant's memory is as long as the Path of Life itself. Its invincible anger lasts for a hundred years at least, but Gandaya's anger had lasted for more than three hundred years and it was bound to last till the end of Eternity, for Gandaya was a beast of the Immortals and it knew no age.

Whenever he was alone, grazing far away from his herd as he was doing now, the Spirit of Anger would rise high in his mind and the red mist of fury would dim his fierce eyes. He would explode into destructive actions, venting his wild spleen against the innocent trees. He would push the highest mopanis over and uproot the spreading mungas, trampling them to splinters.

He was at it now, and his wrath was terrible. Trees were forcibly parted from the sandy bosom of Mother Earth and they crackled and roared as they plunged. The dying cries of the tall masasas were heard in the splintering of their brittle branches as they succumbed to the wrath of the great Indlovu. Dust and disinherited grass flew high from under the trampling and shuffling feet of Gandaya and his wild, savage trumpeting shook the forests of Kariba Gorge. The frightened birds trembled and left their homes in clouds of twittering terror, seeking security in the blue heavens.

At last he paused in his task of destruction and with this pause for breath he sent a wild and savage note of sheer elephantine pleasure ringing as a challenge through the sacred gorge.

It was then that an unpleasantly familiar—a most hated smell came drifting towards him, borne on the wings of the rustling breeze. It was the smell of that kind of animal that Gandaya hated more than any other smell under the sun . . . the acrid stench of human beings!

A red mist crept over Gandaya's eyes. His great feet itched to crush the hated little bipeds into slime—the slime from which they had crawled æons ago. His long trunk burned to flail them into a bloody pulp and his great tusks longed to string them like beads.

Gandaya the Trampler thundered down the forest-veiled slope of the great gorge, leaving dust and fallen trees in his wake. He roared down to the river and plunged into it. The smell of human vermin grew stronger as he surged out of the river and up the other slope of the gorge.

He tore and smashed his way through the forest with fiery impatience. At last he ascended a small hill and scanned the distant plains. There they were. There were thousands of them—myriads of these puny, infernal little pests. This was the moment of glory. Trample the filthy vermin into the dust; crush the biped scum to a pulp!

Gandaya made his way down the grassy hill with gradually quickening pace.

There is open dissension among the Nguni, Mambo and Xhosa tribes. The people are openly rebelling against crossing the Zambezi at Kariba. Many cry out that they would rather die than enter that mysterious gorge populated, according to legend, by all kinds of monsters. Agitators for secession are exploiting the insubordination to the hilt, and one fat, shrill-voiced harridan named Lokota is the driving force behind all this rebellious sentiment: "They dare not send us in there!" she screams to a large crowd who nod and hang on to her every word. "They are asking you to hazard your lives and the lives of your children by going into that gorge. Thousands of chiefs and heroes have gone there and not one came back alive. Do not the Holy Legends say that in that gorge lives a witch named Luamerava who eats newborn babies and turns men into stone? You all know the Holy Legends . . . you know all about brave chiefs who took long journeys from their lands to that place over there . . . and were never seen again except in dreams. Who does Celiwe think we are—and Xhosa—and what does that vile witch Ma-Ouzaranena make of us—infernal, invincible, immortals like herself? I say we must all refuse to go into Kariba. We must sit down here and refuse to budge. What say you, Oh my brothers and sisters?"

The mob roared its approval and soon a full three-quarters of the Mambo, Nguni and Xhosa tribes were firmly behind Lokota. They made it quite plain that they were not going near—let alone into—the Kariba gorge. Many made ready to turn back.

The three High Ones—Ma-Ouzaraena, Celiwe and Xhosa—sent warriors to intercept these would-be deserters.

And then, just before sunset, the largest elephant that ever walked the earth tore into the milling, gesticulating, rebel tribesfolk with the fury of an avalanche. He trampled a path of death through them and soon the people saw the limp body of a beautiful dark-skinned woman impaled on one of its gleaming tusks. The woman was Muwende-Lutanana, the mother of my two sons, Demane and Demazana!

I fought my way through the milling, panic-stricken masses. My soul was seized with a devastating anger. I stumbled over mangled bodies but did not care. I made straight for that thundering, charging brute, and when he saw me he accelerated his pace. I concentrated all my mental power straight at the oncoming beast and a force struck the tusk on which my wife was impaled, shearing it off at the root. With a searing, trumpeting scream of shock, fear and pain, the mighty Gandaya reared on his hind legs. He sagged to the ground for a moment, but rose again and fled with pathetic, heart-rending shouts of despair.

It was not the wild trumpeting of a brute wounded in an act of aggression. It was an appeal for help from a loyal animal, in the service of someone or something it fears, loves and reveres. It dawned on me that it could be true that Gandaya was more than just a murderous brute with an abnormal hatred of humanity. Gandaya was a loyal guardian belonging to somebody who wanted to remain hidden and unknown.

I was seized with a strange feeling of remorse and pity for the huge animal and for having used my supernatural powers of destruction on it—something I save only for hostile gods and immortals. I decided to follow Gandaya. But he sensed my pursuit and tried his best to shake me off. This continued till the sun sank in the golden west and darkness crept across the forest-veiled land.

The sound of footsteps behind me brought me to a halt and soon my two daughters Luanaledi and Mabaliyamswira stood by my side. "We have come to call you back, father," said Mbaliyamswira.

"So at last you believe that I am your father!"

"Yes," replied Luanaledi. "The Queen Ma-Ouzarauena has told us and all the people the truth at last. The Mambo and Nguni warriors mutinied just after we saw you chasing the elephant. With Celiwe leading them, the Nguni warriors surrounded Ma-Ouzarauena and demanded that she tell them where you went on that night when she made her appearance for the first time. They told her that they would enter the Kariba Gorge only under the leadership of their Great Lumukanda, the mighty lost Immortal. She then told us that you had gone and drank from the fountain of youth—as she had hinted before."

"Come back with us, Oh father, and speak to the people," Mbaliyamswira pleaded. "You alone can persuade them. They are all in a mutinous mood now."

We made our way back to where the countless thousands of people were occupied in building temporary shelters for the night and lighting a huge circle of fires to keep wild animals away. Many were also busy digging graves for those killed by the elephant.

* * * * *

It is past midnight and I have just won a great victory after having almost talked my head off my shoulders. They cheered me enthusiastically when I promised them I would go into the gorge first and make short work of any monsters, witches, demons and hostile gods that might be residing there. Before launching into what has been the longest speech of my life I had ordered the arrest of the fat agitator Lokota.

"Thank you, my people," I smiled at them benignly. "That is very good. I am sure your glorious ancestors are now greatly pleased. Forward at all times—that is what your forefathers believed in and that is what you must also believe in. We must advance in the name of the Highest of the Most High, and woe betide anyone or anything standing in our way! The survival of the Tribes—the safety of your children as yet unborn—depends on our reaching the mysterious land beyond the Limpopoma. Some of you have been urging others to go back. Do you want to remain in a land now crawling with Arabi slave-raiders? Do you wish to return to the land in which you were nearly wiped out, first by pestilence and then by famine? Have you so soon forgotten the dark, leering spectres of death and destruction?"

"Aieeee!" roared the people. "No . . . no, we have not forgotten!"

"Do you promise that you will follow me, who saved you from famine, from death, without questioning how I will lead you and where I will take you?"

"Yes . . . Yes!" they roar. "You and you alone we shall follow, Oh Great Father Lumukanda."

"Lumukanda of the Granaries—Saviour of the People," they shout again and again. "We remember the granaries of Lumukanda!"

I turn away, followed by resounding cheers from the throats of more than five million people. Everybody is now happy and everybody is determined to go with me to the very edge of the world if need be—I can feel it in my bones.

Flames of elation burn fiercely within my heart. I am going to succeed in my God-appointed task after all. I am going to lead the tribes to and beyond the Limpopoma. I am once again Lumukanda the High Chief—the leader of the Tribes. My Indunas and my wives will take some time to get over the shock of my changed appearance.

I am determined to go into Kariba directly to prove for all time the truth or otherwise of the legends that say the place is inhabited by all manner of monsters and witches. Somehow I have a strange feeling that the legends are not far off the truth.

A dark figure bars my way as I walk slowly towards where my wives and daughters have just laid Muwende-Lutanana to rest, with the great tusk to mark the solitary grave.

"I beg to talk to you, my Lord," says Ma-Ouzarauena.

"I have no time to talk to you or anybody else now. Just do me one favour, I beg you . . ."

"Anything you say, my Lord."

"Go and loose yourself in the forest." I brush past her and kneel at the grave of my unhappy Muwende. "Farewell Muwende, farewell child. You probably know by now that you have not died in vain. We shall cross the Zambezi at Kariba and the Tribes will always remember your name. Farewell, my unhappy Muwende."

I rise to my feet and without another glance at the silent, torch-carrying women standing around the grave I turn and make my way through the night towards Kariba.

Luanaledi suddenly emerges from the darkness and falls into step behind me. She has brought my huge mpanga and heavy, wooden club—and she carries a spear as well.

We walk in silence while around us crickets chirp their joy to the night-sky.

At last we reach the deep gorge of mystery. Far below us we see the Zambezi clearly outlined in the moonlight. "Be on your guard, dear parent," says Luanaledi huskily, "I sense danger!"

The brooding gorge is strangely silent—like a foul, night-prowling beast ambushing its prey. Even the trees hold their rustling breath.

Then a booming voice charged with incredible insolence strikes up and echoes and re-echoes through the great gorge: "Intruders, I sensed you enter this forbidden place and I now warn you—you have time to retrace your steps Do so now. I, Zaramaesi, the Lord of Kariba, have spoken!"

"Father, let us go and find that impudent wizard!"

* * * * *

Even as she spoke a voodoo python appeared from nowhere and coiled itself around her. I stooped and wrung its neck before it could crush the breath from Luanaledi. As I flung aside its limp form, I came face to face with the ugliest ape-man that ever walked the earth. He introduced himself as Odu, a name that sounded vaguely familiar, and I induced this brute to lead us to his lord and master.

Thus we passed through a secret entrance into a vast underground cavern of dazzling beauty. There was a large bronze dwelling, ablaze with brilliant stones of all kinds and sizes, and pots and other vessels of fantastic metal workmanship. Huge mats of a soft fibrous material dyed into scores of colourful patterns adorned the highly polished smooth walls and floor. A tall figure stood on the far side of the dwelling, facing us with arrogantly folded arms. He wore an elaborately moulded and decorated ritual mask over his head—a mask made of silver so dazzlingly bright that it rivalled the moon. It had a pink fringe of what looked like very fine fibre. This tall man was covered from shoulders to feet in a glossy black kaross heavily decorated with sunstones and waterstones of all colours from green to bright red. On his powerful fore-arms blazed broad bracelets inlaid with flaming magic stones that glowed like smouldering embers.

I suddenly developed a surge of unreasonable murderous hatred towards that masked man. He became the target of all the hatred that my soul could brew. Through a mist of blinding anger I heard his voice saying coldly: "Kneel, miserable mortals . . . kneel in my presence!"

"Miserable mortals indeed!" I retorted. "I am Lumukanda, the Lost Immortal . . ."

The mention of my name seemed to strike him a profound physical blow. His arms unfolded and fell to his sides and he took a step forward. "Whom did you say you are?"

I lost control of myself and pounced upon him. The savage struggle that ensued was perhaps the strangest of all time. With every blow I dealt him I felt the pain in the corresponding part of my body, and it was evident that he also felt the pain of the blows he inflicted upon me. The struggle continued until both of us sank to the ground unconscious.

Finally a voice reached me across a great distance and I sensed relief in it. "He moves—he is alive! Oh praise be to the Highest of the Most High!"

I opened my eyes and looked into the beautiful face of Luanaledi who promptly put her warm lips to my forehead. "Thank the gods you are alive, father."

I was lying on my back on one of the soft, brightly coloured mats inside the dwelling and there was a cool freshness all over my body. Someone had bathed me from head to foot while I was unconscious. Slowly I sat up and my eyes fell on a huge, beautifully decorated, bowl full of water. My eyes also fell on the strange female kneeling beside the large basin and I turned my head away, sick and nauseated to the core of my soul.

Such a creature as that strange woman, with her yellowish, brownish-red skin, should not be allowed to live in this universe. Such a strange revolting being—be it human or animal—simply cannot exist.

We all eat and enjoy sweet things—like honey and ripe plantains. We enjoy chewing sweet cane, and we know that even sweetness can be revolting if there is too much of it. The same applies to beauty—if carried beyond the limit of its extreme it can be more revolting than ugliness.

And the woman I saw kneeling beside the bowl was extremely beautiful—and utterly revolting in that there was too much of it. It may be difficult to believe, but ugliness, no matter how great, is a natural thing, and nature is only beauty. Mountains are ugly, yet profoundly beautiful in their utter ugliness. Ugliness is either utterly revolting or thoroughly amusing, but beauty-in-extreme though fascinating, can also repel, and even disgust.

If the many chiefs who had lost their lives in search of the legendary Luamerava, the Illusion of Kariba, had known they were risking their lives for a creature whose very appearance would have sent them running in bewildered flight, they would not have ventured there in the first place. And they would have thanked the gods for the imperfection of their own wives. They would have left the creature alone to be admired by the stars, the mountains and the timeless Zambezi. She is an unnatural, forbidden creature that no man can possess and yet remain sane—a gaudy flower whose scent is spread by the breeze of heaven. I heard her voice as she spoke to Luanaledi:

“We might as well tell the Lord, your father, the truth, Oh Princess Luanaledi.”

“I would rather we waited a few moments,” my daughter replied. “He looks tired and weak, and the shock might be too great.”

“As the Princess says,” murmured the Illusion of Kariba.

“What is it?” I demanded. “What has happened?”

“Please rest, father, you are tired. Try to keep calm.”

“No, I insist that you tell me what has happened!”

“As the lord commands,” said the Illusion of Kariba from behind Luanaledi. “Who are we to disobey him?”

She strode across towards the entrance of the dwelling. I rose to a sitting position and then I noticed the lifeless body of my adversary. Luamerava slowly removed the silver mask from the dead man’s face.

I was immediately struck by the familiarity of the face. Somewhere I had seen this face before, and quite recently. But I could not immediately place it. Like me, he had a small star-shaped scar of immortality between his eyes. The vague familiarity began to disturb me and I said so to my daughter.

“It’s you . . . father,” was her strange statement.

“Me? How can this man be me? You must be dreaming, Luanaledi.”

“It is you, father,” she insisted. “A futuristic projection of yourself, say ten thousand years hence . . .”

“What nonsense are you talking about, girl. How can I be alive and dead at the same time?”

“Explain to him, Luamerava.”

“As you command, Princess. If the Lord, your father, will honour me by listening . . .”

“Speak . . . I hear you.”

“My Lord, for generations people of all tribes have known the gorge of Kariba as a holy and forbidden place, even though many do not know why it is so. They simply believe the very soil of Kariba is sacred, and that is as far as their knowledge goes. Kariba is not sacred simply because I have lived here for thousands of years; it is sacred because here is the navel of the earth. Here is the source and the mouth of the River Time. It is from here in Kariba that a new race of men and gods shall spring when the most Ultimate God creates a new earth and a new universe from the ashes of this one we see . . ."

"I know all about that," I responded coldly. "What I want to know is why my daughter refers to this dead body as mine."

"Your forgiveness, Lord. You, Lumukanda, have been alive now for exactly two thousand years . . ."

"I know that."

"And you are destined to live for another ten thousand years," smiled the Illusion of Kariba, ignoring my interruption. "In the course of your life you will see many things, fight many battles, and love women without number. But after nine thousand years of life the evil spirit of ambition and pride will possess you. You will venture out to conquer the whole earth, and the heavens as well. You shall betray and slay the greatest king of all time, Luzwi, whose birth in the far future you are now fighting to bring about . . ."

"What? What are you talking about?"

Luamerava ignored the interruption again and went on coldly, relentlessly: "You will become proud and mad and cruel. Men will cringe and cower at the very sound of your footsteps. The very stars will weep when they witness the sting of your tyranny. You will end by destroying the Race of Man, and you will continue to reign in a world barren and dark—all alone. You will be afflicted by a strange disease that will force you to eat the souls of the stars in order to remain alive. In desperation you will board the magic canoe and sail the river time—upstream—returning to your past . . . our present . . . Here your future self will meet your present past, and the latter will kill the former."

"It has already happened!" I screamed insanely. "That body over there is mine, returned from the future, and my present self has killed my future replica. This is utter madness!"

I went completely berserk. Shaft after shaft of mental power left my frame and wrecked the contents of the cavern. I had a last glimpse of Odu seizing me, before the entire cavern collapsed upon us.

* * * * *

It is midnight and I hear distinctly the roar of lions in the forest outside. I also hear the yapping of jackals and the wild laughter of hyænas in the distance beyond. Slowly I open my eyes. It is dark and there is something soft and alive next to me. I feel a warm yielding breast—a smooth shoulder and arm. It is Ma-Ouzarauena, and she wakes up slowly.

"The spirit of life has returned to your body, my husband. The people feared you were dead."

"What . . . what happened? How did I get here?"

"The huge Odu brought you here from Kariba, my Lord, and that terrible animal Luamerava brought in poor Luanaledi. Both these creatures say they belong to you, they are your servants. They told us of everything that happened there. Out there the people are worshipping you, Lumukanda. They insist that you are a god, after successfully capturing the Illusion of Kariba and her companion Odu, and killing that monster in there."

"Did they tell you who that monster was that I killed?"

"They did not say, but I know nevertheless."

* * * * *

The mass crossing took place ten days later. It was a crossing destined to live forever in song and story for many hundreds of years to come.

I had ordered twenty great rafts to be built, each big enough to accommodate fifty. Each raft was shaped as a triangle and was built of mnongo logs lashed together with thick plaited ropes of cow hide. To the corners of each raft were attached long cow hide ropes with which the warriors operated the rafts backwards and forwards, two hundred standing either side on the banks of the river.

We transported more than a thousand people a day with the rafts only. Many people also found their way across in the fleets of canoes at our disposal. And for the first time in the history of the Tribes a floating bridge was built by lashing logs together. At first only the bravest warriors used this bridge; but when it proved to be reasonably safe, many others risked the crossing that way.

It took six whole moons to transfer the five million people across the Zambezi and only fifty were drowned in the entire operation. Their raft capsized as a result of a fight between two men over a girl which started in midstream.

We could not ferry the livestock. We forced all the cattle and goats into the river and made them swim across, guided by fleets of canoes.

While the whole operation was in progress, those who had already crossed gradually settled in temporary villages spread over a wide area. People scooped up handfuls of the holy sand of the Kariba gorge and poured it into small skin bags which they kept as mementoes of their passage through the holiest place on earth. About two hundred people of both sexes, led by the Nguni philosopher Mpungose, one of Celiwe's consorts, elected to remain behind in Kariba to spend the rest of their lives in prayer and meditation. These people and their descendants were afterwards known as the "Holy Ones of Kariba". The fame of this little tribe has spread far and wide. Its members travel out periodically to neighbouring lands to assist, especially newly founded tribes, helping them to lay down their laws, attending to the sick and needy, and settling inter-tribal disputes. They practise a form of faith healing, and never use medicines.

Present-day descendants of this tribe are easily recognisable. Men normally wear a tortoise-shell headband and they carry teak staves with carved snakes coiled around them. They are normally heavily bearded. They prefer jackal-skin loincloths. These are descendants from the Holy Ones of Kariba, the Gateway to Eternity—the Navel of the Earth.

JOURNEY TO THE SOUTH

ABOUT two hundred years after our passage through Kariba two small tribes came to dwell with the Holy Ones in the Holy Place and these tribes were the Tonga-Ila and Ba-Tonga. They are regarded even today as the Guardians of Kariba and as standing directly under the protection of the most Ultimate God. Any tribe disrupting or disturbing these tribes is immediately attacked by its neighbours and driven from the land in disgrace. Such is the Law of the Tribes.

In the great journey to the south we were following the tracks of Gandaya—the greatest beast that ever trod the earth. He had also decided to leave Kariba and he was going southwards for some unknown reason.

The great elephant always remained a few days' journey ahead of us and whenever we paused to rest, Gandaya also loitered near us. He always remained within sight; we could see him far in the distance amongst the trees, grazing and minding his own business. Eventually he dictated when and where we should rest, and when he decided to stop for a moon in one place, so did we.

It was during one of these moon-long pauses that Zulu and Qwabe, the sons of Celiwe and Malandela of the Nguni, got themselves into serious trouble. The result of this was that both these youths were circumcised six moons earlier than the appointed time for their initiation.

It was quite an amusing incident. They had in the meantime grown into tall, strong, young men. Qwabe was twenty-one summers old and Zulu eighteen. One day, while these two boys were out hunting with my three sons, Mukombe, Demane and Demazana, they saw a young man and a girl going into the forest. Zulu, who was the most inquisitive boy under the sun, lost all interest in the hunt and started trailing the lovers instead. Qwabe followed him, intending to bring him back, but he too developed a strong curiosity. The sons of Malandela were soon lying side by side on their bellies behind some thick shrubs witnessing the antics of the lovers in the long grass a few paces away, with wide-eyed, open-mouthed fascination. And when they returned to camp that night they were walking like people in a daze and the sight they had seen haunted their dreams in the nights that followed.

Zulu, who was a little 'wise fool', soon told his more slow-witted elder brother that, Tribal Law or no Tribal Law, he was going to find himself a girl and explore with her the possibilities they had witnessed.

On the following day these two young stupids decided to waylay a young girl near the river with blatantly obvious and most unlawful intentions. For a long while they crouched behind a thicket close to the path the young women and girls took on their way to fetch water. At last a tall, slender, very beautiful virgin came striding along the path, all on her own, with a clay pot balanced on her head.

Zulu and Qwabe waited with bated breath and pounding hearts for the girl to draw close, then they sprang like leopards upon her. But they made a very wrong choice indeed! Their lovely prey was none other than my daughter Mbaliyamswira (Flower of Passion), and immortals, much more so than mortals, take strong exception to being violated, be it by amateurs or specialists.

To add to the overflowing bowl of their misfortune, Ma-Ouzarauena appeared on the scene and it was not long before they stood before a Tribal Tribunal with thoroughly wetted loinskins. They stood there facing a hundred and fifty very unsympathetic Rainbow Indunas from all three tribes. Also present were fifteen Tribal Avengers, and of course, Malandela, Celiwe, Mxhosa, Ma-Ouzarauena and myself. The poor boys were so scared they were trembling from head to foot and wetting their loinskins without pause.

The old Avenger Leader stood up and his voice roared from the circular mouth of his mask: "Hear me, everybody, Zulu and Qwabe, the sons of Malandela of the Nguni, stand here accused of trying to rape the daughter of Lumukanda of the Mambo. I say, and I say again, that both these boys are guilty and they are free to try and prove their innocence—if they can!"

"Boys," said Malandela in a broken voice, "tell the truth now—did you try to take the honour of Mbaliyamswira by force?"

"N-no father," stammered Qwabe. "I m-mean y-yes father."

"Don't give two contradicting answers at the same time, boy!" roared the Tribal Avenger. "Did you or did you not try to rape Lumukanda's daughter? Answer!"

"Y-yes, we d-did sir."

"Did you not know you were breaking the law?" the Avenger Leader bellowed.

"We . . . we . . ."

"Quiet! You were spitting upon the Laws of your forefathers."

"P-please sir . . ."

"Quiet! We find you guilty and as the Law dictates, punishment must be meted out by the parents of the girl you tried to rape."

Celiwe buried her face in her hands and Malandela groaned as the Avenger handed Ma-Ouzarauena the Spear of Justice. The latter advanced slowly and menacingly upon the two boys. They tried to run away but were seized by the Avengers and brought back. To everybody's surprise Ma-Ouzarauena merely made them bend over and she gave each the biggest thrashing of his life with the shaft of the spear. Celiwe thanked Ma-Ouzarauena humbly for her mercy. Malandela turned to the witchdoctor Kokovula and told him to take the two boys and initiate them into manhood according to the Law.

* * * * *

Kokovula is grinning most savagely in his beard. He is going to enjoy the coming ceremony very much. He is very fond of circumcising boys and, although the law requires that a very sharp knife be used, Kokovula has other ideas about Zulu and Qwabe.

These two boys have been fasting for five whole days and they have been confined together in a dark hut full of leering, obscene-looking masks of lions, water and mountain gods and a few demons as well. Also there were strung up against the walls the skulls of Malandela's ancestors and skin bags full of the dried foreskins of nearly all those long-dead men.

Zulu and Qwabe are quaking with fear—and who could blame them?

The boys are casting fearful glances at the huge 'circumcision mask' standing on an ornately carved wooden tripod in the corner of the hut. This hideous mask represents the Goddess of Fertility, Nomkubulwana, and it looks ugly enough to scare the hide off a rhinoceros.

The boys also glance nervously at the rough, hard, pehla sticks in a bowl of water. Qwabe has heard about the use of these sticks in an initiation ceremony and not one bit does he like what he had heard. Towards midnight drums erupt into violent sound as the two witchdoctors assisting Kokovula begin the 'drum prayer'. Kokovula enters the hut and orders the boys to come out. He is wearing a hideously grinning mask of animal skin and he is covered from shoulder to ankles in red-dyed fibre. A huge fire has been lit in front of the initiation hut and by the light of this fire Zulu and Qwabe see the two assistant witchdoctors, Vundla and Dondolo, standing behind the heavy drums and beating out the drum prayer for all they are worth.

Kokovula drags both boys near to the fire and tells them to take off their loinskins, throw them into the fire, and lie down flat on their backs.

The teeth of the two boys chatter with terror as Kokovula and Dondolo, both masked and clad in fibre garments, begin to stamp and caper as they perform the 'prayer dance', chasing each other and gesticulating fiendishly round and round the two boys on the ground. Kokovula stoops suddenly and seizes Zulu by the hair, hauling him to his feet. Then he sends him flying to the dust again with a savage blow in the stomach. The poor boy lets out a squawk and flops on his back like a lost impala-skin doll.

"Be strong!" bellows Kokovula. "Be brave, you are a man now."

Zulu lies sobbing and gasping like a fish stranded on a mudbank—but not for long. Kokovula, who has knocked down Qwabe as well, uttering the same words, comes dancing back to Zulu and hauls him to his feet once more. This time Kokovula's fist crashes against Zulu's head and once more he goes down into the dust and as consciousness leaves him he hears Kokovula snarl: "You are a man now—be wise!"

The two boys, who have both been knocked unconscious in the same way, are now revived with a mixture of urine and water thrown over them. The urine is a donation from ten of the most virile men in the three tribes and is intended to make the boys virile too. As the two boys regain consciousness they are forced to drink some of the stuff.

The three witchdoctors proceed with the dance of fertility, taking turns at capering and at operating the drums. Kokovula and Dondolo eventually seize the two boys and all but flay the skin off them with long wildebeest-tail switches.

Zulu and Qwabe writhe on the ground and yell loudly as the witchdoctors zestfully lay on. The "ritual thrashing" is soon over and once more the two boys are left lying in the dust. The worst is yet to come.

They are now dragged into the hut and Zulu is covered with a heavy kudu-skin kaross to prevent his seeing what is being done to Qwabe. The latter is roughly seized and hauled to his feet by Vundla and Dondolo, while Kokovula lifts the heavy 'mask of circumcision' and moves it to the centre of the hut. The mask reaches up to Qwabe's waist. Above the forehead of the mask there is a carving in the hard wood, with a hole through the centre.

This carving is not just an ornament but a feminine symbol of fertility. On the back of the mask, below the hole, is a receptacle carved in the same piece of wood—a small bowl to receive the blood and the foreskin of the boy to be circumcised.

The two lesser witchdoctors bring Qwabe to the front of the mask and force him to insert his member of manhood through the hole above the forehead. Kokovula performs the operation on the other side. Qwabe yells with pain and tries to withdraw, but the two witchdoctors press him hard against the mask so that blood may flow into the small bowl.

Zulu, who has been fearfully peeping from under the kaross and has seen everything from start to finish, lets out a loud howl and makes for the entrance. He crashes into the closed wicker door and is quickly recaptured. With a sneer on his ugly face, Kokovula rubs the edge of his knife lightly on his whetstone to make it even blunter.

* * * * *

For twenty-one days after this the sullen boys were confined to the initiation hut, and daily they had to listen to Kokovula's lengthy lectures on the twenty-one different love-mat techniques. They were carefully instructed on the methods used in cases where the woman is tall or short, lean or fat, and the precise preparation of medicines to use to counteract evaporating potency.

The night of the twenty-second day, before the 'coming out ceremony', the two boys were visited by a woman. She was naked but her identity was shielded by a heavy mask elaborately fringed with fibre. The identity of such a 'midnight visitor', be it a female in the case of boys being initiated or a male in the case of girls, is always kept very secret. But of course, as an all-seeing immortal I know the identity of the 'midnight visitor' who came to give Zulu and Qwabe their practical experience and at this stage I see no harm in disclosing it. She was Dambisa-Luwewe, Malandela's royal concubine, the famous dancer.

Qwabe passed the test to Kokovula's satisfaction. But Zulu was found to be far too virile and was not directly released. He had to be subjected to further treatment to 'blunt his horns a bit'. He was given the pehla treatment to reduce his potency.

Finally the time arrived for the coming out ceremony and the two boys were brought forth from the 'hut of purification' to the thunder of drums and the chanting of hundreds of warriors. The boys were daubed from head to foot with white clay and red stripes. A white path was painted from the entrance of the initiation hut to the gate of the improvised stockade surrounding the temporary 'forbidden kraal'. This path always represents the 'road of life' which such young men have to take. In this case, as usual too, masked men representing 'fertility gods' and long-dead ancestors flanked the white path. As the two boys passed, each god and ancestor bestowed a blessing on them.

Zulu and Qwabe were wearing hideous masks themselves, intended to scare evil spirits from their path of life. In addition they carried a staff in one hand and a fowl in the other. These fowls were sacrificed to each of the huge idols flanking the gate of the 'forbidden kraal', both idols representing the most Ultimate God. The ceremony was concluded with savage dancing, wild drumming and torrents of blessings: "Be brave, Oh my sons—fear no man. Be wise, be kind, be resolute and bold. May you beget a hundred sons, and may your love-mats be always green."

* * * * *

After the initiation ceremony the three tribes rested yet another moon, as did our guide, the great elephant Gandaya. It was during this second moon of rest that Bushmen made a daring dawn raid on the cattle pens of one of the most isolated temporary kraals of the settlement. This raid was made under cover of thick morning mist and succeeded in the driving-off of two hundred head of cattle. A company of warriors set out in pursuit of the little yellow-skinned thieves, but they were ambushed and routed with heavy casualties by a Bushman rearguard, armed with poison arrows. Of about fifty brave Nguni, only ten escaped.

The Bushmen proceeded westwards with the stolen cattle and boasted their success in an elaborate painting on the wall of one of their many caves.

Three days after this raid another band of these little yellow thieves tried to break into my cattle pens, this time at midnight. But my Rainbow Indunas and I managed to eliminate fifteen of these skulking rascals and to capture five alive.

Ntombela, my fat Second Rainbow Induna, was killed by a poison arrow while in pursuit of those who escaped. The three tribes were infuriated by these raids and we turned to mounting heavy guards every night around all cattle pens and kraals. They then tried a raid in broad daylight. A band, accompanied by their wives and children, tried to drive off a herd of Mambo cattle grazing on a plain off to one side. The Mambo herdboys raised the alarm and we pursued the raiders, killing ten males and capturing alive three males, fifteen females and ten children.

All these captives were kept in my kraal and the Nguni Rainbow Induna Ziko, the famous singer—who alone could understand their language—acted as interpreter while we interrogated them on all possible subjects.

We learnt a great deal from these captured Bushmen. They taught us how to make beads out of ostrich egg shell and perfumes from tambutu and lubande leaves. We learnt about many herbs that could cure many ills and about others that can be eaten. We learnt how to prepare poisons and suitable antidotes for each.

The Bantu developed a deep fear and reverence for the Bushman and it was not long before colourful stories were being told about their supernatural powers, especially of their womenfolk's reputed ability to turn themselves into any kind of beast at will.

I decided to contact the many groups of roaming Bushmen in the neighbouring mountains with the intention of trading with them. I would have used Ziko as interpreter, but unfortunately, on the very day we were going to set out to the mountains with trade cattle, Ziko stabbed himself with an assagai and died after a violent quarrel with his wife, the Princess Nomikonto, Malandela's sister. Ziko's death was a tragic loss to all of us because not only was he the greatest singer of all time but he was also a man as wise as he was brave. My plan for trading with the Bushmen had to be abandoned because with Ziko gone we could not communicate with them.

Ten days after the death of her husband the Princess Nomikonto, who had been expelled from the Nguni tribe for causing the death of Ziko, took her two handmaidens, Mabashana and Nontombi, to the river to bathe and to wash their skin skirts. It was a hot day and the water was cool and pleasant. Hundreds of butterflies chased each other among the many bright wild flowers in the long grass and birds argued in the tall green-clad mopanis and mungas.

The three women were not laughing though, and they were not singing either, because they were mourning the death of Ziko. There were tears in Nomikonto's eyes and bitterness in her heart; now that her husband was dead she suddenly found that her life had become dark, bitter and empty. The lean handsome face of her husband haunted her dreams by night and by day she seemed to hear his manly voice raised in one of his many famous songs—songs destined to live forever in the memory of the tribes.

Nomikonto longed for her husband. She longed for the strong embrace of the man she had so badly treated while he was still alive. She longed for the love with which he had loved her and which she had not appreciated. She longed for the strong manly presence of Ziko and she could not bring herself to accept the fact that he was gone forever, never to return.

She sobbed quietly as Mabashana and Nontombi rubbed her body with loofahs and the tears that flowed down her cheeks mingled with the cool river water in which she was standing waist deep.

None of the women saw the three Bushmen creeping upon them through the undergrowth until it was too late. In fact, the first inkling the three Nguni females had of the presence of the Bushmen was the crackle of breaking twigs as two of the yellow skulkers burst through the shrubs in their final dash towards the women in the water.

Mabashana screamed as the first of the two Bushmen dived at her, seized her around the waist, swung her like a bundle of skins over his shoulder and proceeded to drag her out of the water into the forest. Nontombi fought savagely with the other Bushman—her fists crashed again and again into the yellowish-brown puffy-eyed face until the little man stunned her with his short club. Nomikonto leapt out of the water and ran, not even bothering to retrieve her skin-skirt on the river bank—and she ran straight into the third Bushman who brought her down in a most ungallant way.

Thus the Princess Nomikonto entered a new life as the wife of a Bushman and she was never seen again.

The Bushmen are great boasters and they like to immortalise their triumphs in life in paintings on the walls of their cave shelters. Many of these paintings depict the little yellow men carrying off Bantu women. Their portrayal is incredibly accurate and in some of them it is possible to identify the tribe, like those showing the sicolo hairdo, characteristic only of Mambo and Nguni women.

After the period of rest the three tribes once more struck camp and moved south. Henceforth we had all the warriors out as a vanguard to the migrating multitudes, as we were then entering the slave-raider infested empire of the Luvijiti, whose capital was the great fort of Zima-Mbje in the south. Here Muxakasa, who had once been Malandela's First Wife, ruled an empire of Mashonas, Arabi and Hottentots—and their numerous mutual bastard products—with exotic tyranny.

* * * * *

In the Royal Dwelling within the mighty walls of the ancient fort Zima-Mbje the hall is crowded to the very entrance with warriors, grey-bearded half-caste Royal Advisers, full-blooded Bantu slaves and eunuchs. A great feast is in progress and the dreaded ruler, the Empress Muxakasa, reclines in haughty splendour on a tambutu and ivory couch, smiling like a she-leopard with a full belly as her warriors toast her again and yet again in foreign wine. She flirts shamelessly with the black-bearded Arabi who have come to buy the thousands of Lunda slaves her warriors had captured. Her couch is flanked by Jovu and Audi, her enormous eunuchs, who are both armed with daggers, axes and mpangas. Her ankles, neck and arms blaze with foreign ornaments of sun-metal and three ostrich feathers grace her shining metal headband. Beside her stand three great grass baskets full of glittering ornaments which the Arabi slavers had brought in exchange for the host of slaves and bags of sun-metal dust.

Muxakasa is swimming like a lewd and shameless fish in the wealth she has gained from her trade in human lives. She is basking like some obscene crocodile in the sun of shimmering splendour which is fed with the souls of countless slaves. She is a walking curse to the lands of the tribes. But she has come to the brink of the precipice of retribution. She does not know it yet, but the hour of her undoing has drawn very close.

She curses the tired dancing girls to urge them to dance even faster. Already some of them have dropped to the ground from exhaustion. She orders the cringing slaves to hurry more food and wine to her gluttonous guests. She orders a slave promptly killed because the exhausted wretch accidentally dropped a tray full of meat on the lap of a foul-mouthed Arabi.

But deep in her rotten soul an uneasiness is growing. She has sent a great army to attack the hordes of black barbarians advancing into her empire from beyond the Zambezi and for ten days she has had no news of it. The uneasiness in her heart is growing in spite of the great quantities of wine she consumes in an effort to still it.

The wild feasting is interrupted by the entry of a badly wounded man, apparently in the last stages of exhaustion. He is a warrior and his hands clutch a horrible, festering wound in his left side. The man totters through the great hall and drops at Muxakaza's feet, gasping for breath and almost fainting with pain.

Muxakaza leaps to her feet and towers over the wounded man, a bowl of foreign wine in one hand. "Who are you, dog, and what do you want?"

"Great Queen," gasps the dying man, "I am one of your battle leaders . . . come to . . . tell you . . ."

Naked fear and dark foreboding tears through the evil soul of the albino queen and in her frenzy she hurls the bowl of wine at the dying man.

"Speak up, dog, what have you come to tell me? Speak up!"

The kneeling man sags forward and his voice is hardly a whisper: "Your army . . . met savages . . . fought bravely, but . . . defeated. I . . . only survivor . . ."

Muxakaza's face darkens with murderous rage. Her eyes protrude and foam shows between her clenched teeth. With a lightning whirl she snatches an axe from the hand of one of her eunuchs and shatters the skull of the prostrate man.

"To the walls!" she screams. "All warriors to the walls! The savages are coming—be prepared to meet them!"

Heavily armed men wearing corselets of crocodile skin and ornate wooden helmets rush to man the walls of the great stone fortress of Zima-Mbje. Some dash to man the wooden stockades that surround the vast city spreading all around the fortress—a city of oblong mud-houses and beautiful and ornately decorated grass huts, all built in a strange foreign style. Regiments of Hottentots, Mashonas and Arabi-Mashona bastards march through the city to the sound of alien music from alien drums and metal bugles. For once in its long and evil history the empire of Luvijiti is on the defensive. For once it cringes and cowers before the advance of an enemy determined to fight to death. The infamous Luvijiti have tasted the cup of defeat once and, like all cruel peoples down the ages, their time has come to taste the cup of fear.

Muxakaza leaves the great hall, where the wild feasting persists, and climbs the short flight of stone steps leading to her private dwelling. There is a hard smile on her cruel mouth and a savage glitter in her eyes. Her slaves, the beautiful half-caste Lukuma and the diminutive Hottentot maiden Wadaswa, meet her as she enters and prostrate themselves before her.

"Has my husband been fed?"

"Yes, great one," answers the half-caste maiden, Lukuma. "The respected one has been fed and brushed as you commanded."

"Good, prepare my bath quickly."

The two slaves leap to obey and in a short time Muxakaza is standing in a big clay bowl being bathed in hot water from head to foot. A few heart-beats later she steps out of the bowl and is rubbed dry by brisk, nervous hands.

Suddenly Muxakaza's arms close around the waist of Lukuma, drawing the surprised slave to her savagely, passionately. Muxakaza's lips crush those of the slave girl in a bruising kiss. Equally suddenly the albino woman pushes the girl away, saying: "If my enemy Lumukanda is leading those savages now invading my land, then you are my only hope of escape, Lukuma."

The slave girl is even more surprised at these strange words and she wonders what her cruel mistress is talking about. She does not realise that Muxakaza, or rather the evil spirit that dwells within her, intends taking over Lukuma's body, should Zima-Mbje fall into the hands of the invaders.

Arrayed in all her finery, Muxakaza makes her way alone into the underground chamber where her 'husband' awaits her. The smell of grass assails her nostrils as she enters the 'dark place of delight'. In the darkness a hoof stamps impatiently and the albino woman laughs as she lets her long leopard-skin skirt fall down. There is savage hunger in her eyes as she advances deeper into the darkness.

* * * * *

The sun has risen and its light falls on the towering rocks that lend the surrounding countryside a rugged beauty. It also falls on the distant stone tower of Zima-Mbje and on the hard faces of the warriors advancing on the walls from the west through the dense bush.

Nine hundred thousand Nguni, Mambo and Xhosa warriors have been working their way slowly but surely round that fortress for the last twenty days and now Zima-Mbje is well surrounded, though the inhabitants of this hated stronghold are not yet aware of it. It is our intention to deny escape to any of the people within the high-walled abomination, especially the foreign slave raiders whom we know to be in there. Every man in the vast army of the 'Three Tribes' is fired with a savage determination to destroy Zima-Mbje so utterly and so thoroughly that nobody will ever dwell within its walls again.

Whatever the cost in time, whatever the cost in lives, Zima-Mbje must be destroyed without mercy. That obscene excrescence of rock and wood must be relegated to the past to which it rightly belongs. We are determined to make an example of this hotbed of harlotry and unmentionable disease.

The order passed on to the rank and file of the armies of the Tribes is simple and to the point: "Spare no one!"

For five hundred years the fortress of Zima-Mbje has been the lair of chiefs who grew fat and rich by capturing and selling fellow black men to those foreign devils, the Arabi. For five hundred years Zima-Mbje has been the den of the vilest women, who sold their bodies to the lecherous Arabi in exchange for trinkets, a thing unheard of in the land of the Tribes before.

And now as an example to all generations of men as yet unborn, Zima-Mbje has to be destroyed—with all its inhabitants and other contents—its wealth of possessions and its moral poverty.

* * * * *

We attacked and were on the hated enemy before they came to realise it. We crashed against the outer stockade and breached it in many places by sheer weight of numbers. Only then did they recover from their surprise. Their arrows, stones and javelins tore into our ranks as clouds of whistling death. Hundreds of brave men fell. The fire-pots of the enemy roasted many of our men alive—but all to no avail; the angry warriors of the 'Three Tribes' were not to be stopped. We tore into their town and butchered Luvijiti and Arabi alike—but especially Arabi! We set their foreign oblong dwellings on fire and seized their women and children and flung them into the flames. Through the smoke and the flames and the whining arrows we advanced in a raging wave upon the stone walls of the fort itself and surrounded it completely.

Here I ordered the massed armies to rest awhile before the final onslaught on the infamous structure. The enemy kept up an unceasing barrage of heavy stones and arrows from the high walls and tower. Their alien stone-throwing catapults and huge multiple spear-discharging bows tore gaps into our ranks and although all this forced us to keep our distance, it nevertheless increased our anger and cold determination. Two of my Indunas, Nsongololo and Shungu, were killed by a heavy stone thrown by a catapult mounted on the wall, and Mabovu, the second Royal Consort of the Nguni Queen Celiwe, was also killed a short while earlier—stabbed in the back while routing single-handed twenty Luvijiti warriors at the stockade.

We did not waste time in mourning the dead. They had fallen with honour and one must rejoice and not mourn when brave warriors fall in honourable battle. Men live and die but once, and happy are those who die in an honourable cause, in brave battle against an evil and pitiless rabble like the Luvijiti and their allies, the Arabi.

A violent thunderstorm was tearing the scowling skies apart with lightning and reverberating thunder as we launched the final attack on the fortress. We led the angry yelling men of the Three Tribes straight at the gate, but were driven back with heavy casualties by a very determined enemy who concentrated all their firepower on our spearhead—fire-pots, arrows, spears, catapult stones and even, by hand, the oblong stones torn from the very walls they stood upon.

The vast armies of the Three Tribes retreated to regroup on the edge of the smouldering townships. High on the tall tower of the great fortress the ruler of the Luvijiti, Muxakaza, stood and taunted us in a loud voice: "Come back and try again, my stinking dirty black friend! Come and try again! Do not be scared! But I warn you, we have enough weapons and missiles here to keep you occupied for a hundred years."

"Bitch!" growled Mavimbela savagely. "Just wait until I get my hands on you."

The Royal Consort of the Nguni, Malandela, turned with a smile on his face and said something to Mavimbela. But his words were drowned by an earth-shaking peal of thunder that was promptly answered by a savage scream from something huge and grey and monstrous, which came lumbering out of the bush behind us—Gandaya had smelled the blood and death of human beings with deep satisfaction.

The huge elephant made straight for the stone fort, and in the mind of the great beast I sensed a hatred so great that my blood grew cold. Gandaya hated the fort Zima-Mbje. Somehow he must have associated the place with the slave-raider whose lance-head was still buried in his foot.

Gandaya was closely followed by the ape-man Odu and the Illusion of Kariba, Luamerava. The roaring warriors followed the huge beast which made its way straight for the closed portals of the fortress. Arrows and spears and heavy stones glanced off Gandaya's body and head. Fire-pots were thrown down upon him, only to bounce off and break on the ground.

There was a splintering crash as the huge beast struck the gate and carried it through, impaled on the one remaining tusk, and it helped the attacker considerably in spreading death, destruction and confusion along a broad path through the fort. A portion of the wall came thundering down and frightening were the shrieks and groans from those who became buried and those who were standing on top.

"Forward, forward!" roared Malandela to the Nguni regiments following him.

"Forward!" came the command from the diminutive pot-bellied chief Mxhosa of the Amaxhosa to his hordes of cut-throats.

"Attack!" bellowed Mavimbela by my side to the Mambo behind us. His command was as usual richly garnished with the foulest curses from his repertoire.

The massed regiments swept forward in perfect battle order. Lightning tore the skies apart and thunder crashed across the rain-swept land as we advanced. Zima-Mbje's doom was nigh.

We advanced upon the gate of the fortress at a steady run and I found two people running on either side of me—Odu and Luamerava. With a rush and a roar we were inside and there was a desperate hand-to-hand battle in which the Luvijiti became mangled and mixed with mud, blood and rain. Bands of Arabi slave-raiders grouped themselves and tried to counter-attack, quite contrary to their inherent cowardice. But we wiped them all out in no time—a measure they so richly deserved. Our arrows and thrown spears hissed skyward at those who fought desperately from the top of the walls. They dropped into the mud below.

The enemy strove to rally in big groups and stand their ground against us, but Gandaya tore savage pathways through them. Some he trampled in bunches underfoot; others he seized with his trunk, flinging them like rotten eggs against the walls. As the thunderstorm rose in fury, so did the savage battle and the slaughtering out there in the rain was enough to nauseate the strongest and bravest.

Meanwhile Odu and Luamerava were searching the place for Muxakaza and it was during the last rounding up of the few who still breathed that Odu shouldered his way through the milling warriors to my side. "My Master, you come and see!"

I followed the huge creature into what had been the private apartments of Muxakaza. We stepped over a dying Hottentot slave woman and went down a flight of stone steps into a dark underground chamber.

Malandela of the Nguni and his three surviving Rainbow Indunas, Mapepela, Malangabi and Solozi, followed us. By the light of the smoky torches we saw Muxakaza lying naked and dead on the grass-strewn floor with a foreign knife in her heart. Lying next to her was the carcass of a zebra which we had been told by Luvijiti prisoners we interrogated, was tame and specially kept by Muxakaza. It was said that the zebra was passionately in love with Muxakaza.

There was a smile of savage triumph on the lips of the dead woman. Tied to the wrist of one limp hand was a piece of soft buckskin on which was figured the insulting message: "You sterile beast, I am alive still. But you will never find me—you stupid fool of an immortal."

"What does that mean?" demanded Malandela. "She is dead and yet she claims to be alive—and that you will never find her."

"This woman's body was taken over by an evil spirit, remember? In all probability that evil soul took over someone else's body and escaped unobserved as that person . . ."

Just then the Illusion of Kariba came in and fell on her knees before me. "Your humble handmaiden begs to report, Lord, that she has found a secret tunnel under the wall of the fort. One woman has made her escape through this tunnel, which leads into the forest. This unworthy servant found her footprints in the tunnel, together with this ornament."

She held out part of a broken copper bracelet.

"So, she has escaped!" cried Malandela angrily. "She has stolen some other woman's body and gone to spread her evil further afield."

"She will not get away—I'll catch her yet!" I said as we turned and left.

* * * * *

Outside the storm had passed on and a clear rainbow graced the eastern sky. The sun had burst through the clouds in the west and their fringes were ablaze with the golden hue of the Lord of Day. Light was reflected by raindrops on the leaves of the tall mopanis and the stones of the great circular tower glistened wetly like a giant fish.

The regiments of the Three Tribes were occupied in burying the dead just outside the great fortress. Many were busy razing the gutted enemy houses to their foundations. Others were collecting every enemy weapon they could find and burying these in a deep hole.

Nobody was allowed to keep so much as the smallest item of Zima-Mbje jewellery, and nobody wanted to, because we already looked upon all such items as thoroughly cursed.

In the ruins of the fortress thousands of elders from the Three Tribes were taking a solemn oath and making a promise to the High Gods that they would see to it that a thing as Zima-Mbje was never built again in their lands—that the infamies of this cruel place would always be recounted in order to discourage future generations from ever trying to emulate the Luvijiti in any way. Lastly, the grey-haired elders placed a 'High Curse' on Zima-Mbje. They cursed it to be desolate, lonely, lost to mankind until the end of time.

Ten days later we left the vicinity of the 'fort of infamy' and followed Gandaya towards the south-east to where the mighty Limpopoma flowed through very dense forests. We were two days' journey distant from the great Limpopoma when open disobedience erupted among the people once again.

Strong deputations were sent to us from each of the Three Tribes. The people were refusing to cross the Limpopoma because, they said, beyond the Limpopoma was a great bottomless precipice marking the edge of the world. Crossing this river was not only a clear invitation to trouble; it was a sacrilege as well. The Holy Legends say that God does not want anyone near the edge of the world. Tension mounted and trouble was in the air.

THE MEALIE TRIANGLE

“WHAT are we going to do about this?” asked Celiwe of the Nguni sadly. “It seems everybody is refusing to cross the Limpopoma. What can we do?”

“I propose that Lumukanda should deal firmly with these rebellious fools,” said the little monkey-faced chief, Mxhosa. “This is just the right time to cross the river; it is at its lowest and the rains will not come for several moons. You must do something, Lumukanda—we all depend on you now.”

“Since we cannot use force on the stupid fools, we have no option but to scare them across,” I said after some pondering. “I have a plan that would make these people cross the Limpopoma faster than they had ever crossed any river before. Give me three days and you shall really see a sight you shall remember for the rest of your lives. But first I want you, the rulers with all those who stand close to you, including your loyal warriors, to cross the river. I shall pretend to cross along with my loyal followers, but I shall return under cover of night to put my plan to work.

* * * * *

“I do not like this, Oh Bengu,” said the old man Dolo to his son-in-law one moonlit night exactly three days later. “The chiefs have gone across the river, but we, the people, are left to our fate on this side. What is going on?”

“I do not know, Oh father of my wife,” said Bengu lazily. “All I know is that nothing will ever make me cross that river. Not only am I tired of these many years of wandering; I am also not going to risk my neck by getting near the edge of the world simply because someone who calls himself a chief says so.”

“The legends say there is nothing beyond the Limpopoma except a great emptiness in which winged cannibals, each with ten eyes, fly about like vultures in search of carrion,” whispered the old man Dolo, casting a fearful glance behind him. “That is why our forefathers called the south ‘Ningizimu’—which means ‘where many ten-eyed cannibals dwell’. Nothing on earth will ever make me cross that river . . . oh no!”

“It is that foreign demon, that wizard Lumukanda,” said Dolo fiercely. “I think he is trying to lead the tribes like blind goats to fall over the bottomless precipice on the edge of the world. I say, and I say again, that Lumukanda is a dirty . . .”

He was cut short by a loud shout from outside—a shout edged with horror and naked, blood-chilling fear. “Aieeeee! Look over there, look over there.”

The shrieks and shouts were repeated everywhere and thousands of people crawled out of their shelters to see what was happening. They saw what they mistook for incredibly large bats flying low from east to west—three that were as large as men. Tens of thousands of eyes stared in horror as the three monstrous bat-like apparitions came flapping slowly and clumsily along, darkly silhouetted against the big round moon.

"They are not bats," shrieked someone. "They are demons! Flee for your lives!"

The people stood their ground watching the oncoming demons in horrified fascination. But when the weirdest sounds came forth, accompanying instructions in no uncertain terms for everybody to cross the Limpopoma, there followed a stampede which was destined to live forever in song and story. It was the strangest, most horrible stampede of all time. Thousands of people, frightened out of their wits, ploughed helter-skelter through the waters of the river and raised billowing clouds of dust under the winter moon along either bank. They stampeded for three whole days and only afterwards could families sort themselves out. There were unfortunately a number of casualties, especially among old people, some of whom merely dropped dead from fright.

A grazing hippopotamus on the opposite bank is reputed to have been pounded into a pulp by the hooves of tens of thousands of cattle. With our combined voodoo powers my First Wife and I, and my two daughters, conjured a too realistic scene; we could have achieved effective results in a less dramatic way.

One moon later we entered the land of a people who were still so savage that they dwelt in trees like monkeys and hunted with stone and bone-tipped spears. In future years the Nguni came to adopt the whole tribe and they in turn adopted the Nguni culture and language. Henceforth they called themselves the Swazi, or Ngwane people. If anybody wishes to land himself in serious trouble he should only call a Swazi a 'raw-flesh-eating tree-dweller'. He should actually do so at a very safe distance and then run away immediately. The Swazi prefer people to believe they are an offshoot of the Nguni. But this is not true.

We fought many a battle with the cunning tree-dwellers before we managed to tame them. They were fond of ambushing herdboys and killing them before driving off the cattle. It was in one of these battles that I lost my adoring adopted son Mukombe, and I wept as I buried him at the foot of the Lebombo mountains. With the death of this youth I lost a brave and smiling, faithful son who had brightened my unhappy life. Forthwith my life would become darker and less tolerable.

After another moon of fighting our way through the land of the tree-dwellers we crossed the Upongolo river and I realised at last that we had reached our destination—the land which would in future become the land of Zulu—the land of the Zulus, or Zululand, and also the land of the Tongas.

I knew that I had finally fulfilled my mission and that my life would henceforth lack a particular purpose, other than minding my own personal affairs.

One morning I sent for my only remaining Rainbow Induna and said to him: "Mavimbela, we have at last reached our destination—a new, greener land where the tribes can live in peace and prosperity for many, many generations to come. I consider my duty as having been done and I praise the Highest of the Most High for having guided me this far, despite all the difficulties. You have been a brave and loyal servant, Mavimbela, and I am going to ask you a last and most important favour. Promise me here and now that you will not deny it to me."

"Say it, Chief, and I shall do it even if I lose my life."

"I want you to take over the Mambo Tribe and be its new chief."

Mavimbela's curse is not translatable, let alone repeatable. "No, no, that I cannot do!"

"I insist that you do it, Mavimbela. I really insist that you do."

"Me, the son of a wall-eyed, wry-necked, knock-kneed fisherman a chief! Never!"

"Mavimbela . . ."

"I said I will never accept chieftainship, Lumukanda. You are not going to unload the responsibilities of being a chief on my shoulders."

He stalked out of the hut and went to sit amongst the warriors in the place of gathering. I followed him and the next thing he knew I had put my chief's headdress on his ugly head and thrown my lion-skin Royal kaross over his broad shoulders. "Warriors of the Mambo, your new chief," I shouted to the assembled warriors. "Be loyal and true to him and his children, and children's children."

The warriors roared their assent and raised their spears and other weapons in salutation to the brave, popular man who was now their new chief.

Mavimbela wept—tears of real anger and sorrow. He begged and pleaded, with me and his warriors in turn.

"Come on, you old coward," cried a young warrior, "you are so ugly and so big, you are more fit to be a chief than any of us. We shall enjoy worrying and hating you, you are just made all round to be a chief."

"Whom are you calling a coward? Shall I mention by name the thousand battles I have fought and won? I have killed more animals and men than . . ."

"Show us how brave you are by becoming our chief."

"You - - - - -," cursed Mavimbela, tugging nervously at his royal head-dress and settling it more firmly on his head, "that ought to convince you."

The next moment Mavimbela nearly had an apoplectic fit and the warriors roared with laughter when I made him a coronation present of my two thousand wives and concubines. He raved and swore luridly as I ordered each of the women to kiss him—in public. The giant former Rainbow Induna, now revered chief of the Mambo, had the time of his life trying to break free from the giggling women who were caressing him with feigned gusto. The Mambo warriors roared with laughter as the great Mavimbela, the famous, incurable woman-hater, was frogmarched by laughing, shrieking women into the Great Hut of the new kraal that was still under construction, to give him the first thorough bath he had had for moons.

When at last Mavimbela was washed and anointed with scented hippo fat and was sitting dejectedly in his hut surrounded by his concubines and wives, I asked him to adopt my two sons Demane and Demazana and rear them as his own. This he agreed to do quite readily.

Ten days later I left with Odu, Luamerava, Ma-Ouzarauena, Lulama-Maneruana and my two daughters, and we set out towards the east, drawn by some strange power which wanted something to happen—something that was destined to change the life of all the tribes throughout the land.

* * * * *

Lulama-Maneruana was alone in the sun-drenched forest. She had gone to get a claypot full of water and had decided to bathe afterwards in the cool clear water of the gurgling stream. Now she was sitting on a dark rock with one foot in the bubbling crystal water. She was running an elaborately carved horn comb through her soft, fuzzy hair that was partly that of an Arabi and partly that of her Mashona mother.

Her skin skirt lay beside her, as were her necklaces and other ornaments. The hot sun was pleasant on the pale brown skin of her perfectly shaped body. Birds twittered as they built their nests in the tall trees above and butterflies fluttered among the many flowers around her—a beauteous symphony in colour, shape, sound and movement. The heavenly scent of the green forest was pleasing in the nostrils of Lulama-Maneruana and the sounds of bird song were delicious in her ears.

The beautiful half-caste, who had seen and endured so much in her eventful life, enjoyed the colourful and scented solitude of the unspoiled forest. She closed her long-lashed brown eyes and drew a deep breath of perfumed air. She did not see the strange metal-clad man advancing softly behind her. She did not see his blue eyes alight with adoration and the flush that tinted his white, alien face. She only felt his presence when she heard his voice at the same time—a kindly voice that formed words which sounded to her ears like “Buwena Diye . . . Sinyora.”

Lulama-Maneruana leapt to her feet, snatched up her skin skirt and swung around to face the owner of the gentle alien voice. She saw a man, tall and strong, and through the gaps in his armour she saw that his skin was much lighter than those of the Arabi with which she was familiar—a race to which her father belonged. This man’s hair was long and soft and his beard was pointed, trimmed and glossy. Both his hair and his beard were as black as midnight. His nose was long, but not hooked like that of the Arabi, and his eyes were a brownish-blue.

He wore a helmet of bright grey metal with a ridge on top and a red feather flowing behind it, like cold fire. He also wore a corselet of the same metal, with sleeves and elbows. All surfaces were richly engraved with patterns representing a kind of flowering plant with which Lulama-Maneruana was not familiar.

His feet and legs were sheathed up to the thighs in strange footwear and on his left side hung, from a broad bluish-purple belt that went over his right shoulder, a sheathed, deadly-looking weapon—obviously a sword of some description. It was a thin, wicked-looking thing that gradually tapered to a needle-sharp point.

Even as Lulama-Maneruana watched open-mouthed with her skirt held defensively before her, the alien smiled broadly, revealing an even row of pearly teeth. He doffed his metal helmet with a sweeping gesture and bowed stiffly to her, saying something that was obviously friendly in his foreign tongue, concluding with the word that Lulama-Maneruana found fascinating—and she wished to learn its meaning—Sinyora.

“What are you?” she asked at last. “Are you a demon?”

The alien did not understand, of course. She pointed to him and raised her delicate eyebrows in gentle inquiry. The man smiled back and pointing to himself with his thumb, uttered a word which sounded like “Potugeesa”.

Just at that moment ten more of the aliens emerged from the forest led by one wearing a long dark-brown robe reaching to his ankles. He was carrying a staff on the top of which was a bronze statuette of a man of some race, nailed to a cross of wood by his hands and feet. All the others wore helmets and cuirasses of leather. Two of them carried strange tubes with wooden stocks—obviously weapons of some kind. The rest of the aliens carried long heavy weapons that looked like a cross between a spear and a battle-axe and, like the first, they wore swords at their sides. Only the hooded man in the dark-brown robe carried no weapon.

Unlike the first man, these newcomers had no beauty about them. The robed man had a thin sour-looking face and the other nine had the atmosphere of ruffians about them. There was one with a peculiar thing tied with a string over his left eye.

Lulama-Maneruana dived into the water and put on her skirt while standing waist deep, much to the amusement of all the aliens except the sour-looking robed one who turned his back and made peculiar gestures, obviously magic, on his forehead, chest and shoulders with his right hand.

While Lulama-Maneruana was putting on her ornaments she heard the men conversing and whenever they addressed the first alien she heard a word sounding like "kapitanoh".

"So his name is Kapitanoh," thought Maneruana as she left the water with a wet, clinging skirt. Just then she saw Ma-Ouzarauena emerge from the forest, accompanied by Mbaliyamswira.

"Royal concubine Maneruana," called out Ma-Ouzarauena, "what is going on there? Who are those creatures and what do they want?"

"Respected Ma-Ouzarauena, I do not know. It is best that you come and read their minds."

She came striding through the long green grass, head held high and ornaments gleaming in the sun. The eyes of all the aliens turned towards her and they seemed to sense that she was more than an ordinary human female. The brown-robed alien turned pale and retreated behind his armed fellows, making the same magic gestures on his forehead, chest and shoulders.

"Stop, Great Ma-Ouzarauena, stay where you are," called Maneruana. "You are making them uneasy; they seem to dislike your presence."

Ma-Ouzarauena smiled and slowly came to a stop and she and the aliens studied each other intently across a distance of ten paces. Then Ma-Ouzarauena said softly: "These men are from far beyond the Great Waters and they wanted you to show them the village of our people. They want to trade with us. They need meat and other things to take with them to their homeland. This may come as a surprise to you, Maneruana, but their leader wearing the metal helmet and cuirasse loves you and he wants to take you to his native land."

"Great Ma-Ouzarauena," cried Maneruana, "do not say that. I belong to Lumukanda; I am his concubine."

Ma-Ouzarauena laughed shortly and turned away saying: "Tell them in sign language to come with us. Tell them we are taking them to our chief."

It took some time for Maneruana to bring her message home to the aliens who discussed it at length. They then called out a message to someone in the forest and two more aliens answered the call. They were followed by three black men carrying heavy bags on their heads.

And then all fell in line behind Ma-Ouzarauena, Lulama-Maneruana and Mbaliyamswira, who led them to my new kraal.

* * * * * *

I met the aliens and gave them meat and milk to eat and drink. I also found to my surprise that they were very fond of the eggs of fowls, and their flesh. The Bantu are not terribly fond of these; they keep fowls mostly for their fat which they use in medicines for curing the common cold.

I gave them many fowls and ten oxen as gifts on the day of their departure four days later. Just as they were about to leave their leader came into my hut and told me in sign language—quite unnecessary as I could read his thoughts—that he would give me all the contents of the six great bags which his black servants had brought along, in exchange for Lulama-Maneruana.

He made me understand in poetic gestures that he was deeply in love with my half-caste concubine and he wanted to take her with him in his sea-going canoe to a place called “Potugal” where he, the kapitano had a very big house built of stones, in which he would make Maneruana happy as long as she lived.

He showed me one of the things he had in the bags. It was a cob on which more than two hundred grains grew, and they were of a beautiful yellowish colour in more or less perfect rows. He gave me to understand that these grains were edible and that our kaffir-corn was nothing compared to them.

He advised me to have some of the grains planted and demonstrated how to cultivate the plants. Even before he finished I had seen into the future. I could see this strange-looking foodstuff taking the place of our sorghum as the staple diet of all the tribes. I could see this strange grain flourish in places where sorghums could not grow.

“Yes, kapitano,” I gave him to understand with a nod, “you can have the woman with my blessing.”

He thanked me in his native tongue and bowed twice before showing me what the other bags contained. One of them contained the seeds and the dried fragrant leaves of a plant which they called tobacco—the plant which was destined to earn for the Zulu tribe the nickname of the ‘tobacco-sellers’—Izitengisa-Gwayi. This plant could be smoked like dagga, or ground and mixed with burnt aloe to make a dark-brown habit-forming powder called Gwayi, or snuff.

I accepted both these items of trade, the mealies and the tobacco, in exchange for Lulama-Maneruana, and I ordered Mbaliyamswira and Luamerava to bedeck the beautiful half-caste in her tribal finery and also to prepare for a long journey to the coast.

That night under the laughing moon I placed my hand on Lulama-Maneruana’s smooth shoulders and smiled down at her tear-furrowed face saying: “This is the second time you have sacrificed yourself for the sake of the tribes, Oh beautiful Fallen Saviour. This is the second great sacrifice you are about to make for a race to which you only partly belong—a race which has always despised you because of your mixed blood. Now farewell, Lulama-Maneruana, woman who has seen much and suffered much. Farewell, unhappy half-caste, I am not giving you away as one gives away a chattel. I am not trading you as one would trade a cow. I am giving you away because I can foresee a chance of true happiness for you under the skies of an alien land. I am surrendering you into the hands of a being who truly loves you, more than I can ever hope to—one who, on the shores of a strange land, will give you love and happiness of a kind you can never experience here. The tribes will always remember you. The Sacred Story-tellers shall forever chant your name whenever the History of the Tribes is related to the next generation round our village fires."

She placed her curly-haired head against my chest and her delicate hands tightened round me. She whispered: "My Lord, had it not been you who command me to go with the Strange One I would have refused outright. But out of love for you I am prepared to obey. Oh Lumukanda, I remember much of what you and I have gone through together. I remember my first great adventure with the Princess Nomikonto in the Underworld. I remember what the Ogo said then, and what I did to my own brother's sons. I remember how the Ogo cured me. I remember that incident on the Madlonti mountains when Noliyanda, Vuramuinda and Ninavanh-Ma merged into one being while you and I became completely changed as we drank from the fountain of youth. I remember so much, Lumukanda, so very much! Fresh in my memory is the day when Odu and Luamerava brought you and your daughter Luanaledi from the Kariba Gorge.

"Please take care of that unhappy daughter of yours when I am gone. I remember the scene we all conjured up, with those demon apparitions with which we chased the people across the Limpopoma. Oh Lumukanda, can I ever forget all this?"

"Remember me in your dreams, Maneruana," I told her. "Remember the unhappy immortal of the Land of the Tribes, and pray for him."

"I will, Lumukanda, I will! I have only one more question to ask you—one last question. What does the future hold for me in the land of the Strange Ones, my Lord?"

"The man who loves you, the kapitano, will take you across the seas in his great sea-going canoe. He will wed you according to the laws of his tribe after having made a convert of you to his own religion. You shall kneel with him in a great temple of their God who is hanging from the crossed pieces of wood. You will both be very happy for years to come. You shall wear strange apparel and live in a great house built of stones, with many rooms and many servants and warriors all round.

"But one day, after many years, the kapitano will be killed in a furious battle that will take place on the Great Waters, bravely defending his homeland against a ruthless enemy. Another man will take you perforce into his sea-going canoe, Maneruana, and he too, will be struck by your great beauty. He will take you far across the Great Waters to live in a still stranger land. There you will both live to a very ripe old age, loved and honoured by all."

She was sobbing loudly when I finished and I crushed her against my chest and, with my face buried in her soft hair, I also wept.

She kissed me twice before breaking away and running towards her hut. I made my way slowly and wearily to my own hut and for the whole night I lay there tossing sleeplessly between Ma-Ouzarauena and Luamerava, until dawn sprayed the eastern sky with red and gold.

The weary sun is setting and the heaving, restless sea whispers intimate secrets to the rugged shores. The bulky wooden sea-going canoe of the aliens rides upon the murmuring swells in the distance. Its tall masts sway as the black, gold and red hull rises and falls. I can see men running around, very busy on deck. They are unfurling the vast sheets of material that catch the wind and help to propel the mighty boat over the waves.

I can see four ports on the side of the vessel and through each a wide bronze tube glares malevolently. Strips of brightly coloured material flutter proudly from the tops of the tall masts. A smaller canoe has been lowered down the side of the towering vessel and the men in it row it nearer to the shore with long paddles. Even as I watch another boat, heavily decorated in the stern with designs in red and gold, is lowered and comes leaping and falling over the waves, following the first one. Ruffianly looking aliens leap out of the first boat as it grates on the sandy shore and they rush to load the great pile of meat and water containers of metal-bound wood. The kapitano turns to me and smiles, and bows twice to Ma-Ouzarauena. Then his metal-sheathed arm clasps the narrow waist of Lulama-Maneruana and draws her close.

The aliens, led by their kapitano and Maneruana, shoulder their deadly fire tubes and spears and make their way down to the second boat. My vision dims with tears as I see Lulama-Maneruana turn and wave, while the small boat makes its way towards the great canoe.

The great canoe turns slowly and points its nose south as the sun vanishes beyond the Lebombo mountains in the west. The sheets of material hang cross-wise from the masts and belly out as they catch the wind.

Slowly the huge canoe recedes into the distance until only its masts are visible in the dimming horizon.

Then the truth hits me like a blow from a heavy knobkierie: I will never see Lulama-Maneruana again. My knees grow weak and I collapse weeping like a woman who has lost her husband, like an orphan in a war-shattered land. The ape-man Odu helps me to my feet and I see the hurt and surprise on the faces of Ma-Ouzarauena and Luamerava.

"The great Lord Lumukanda is deeply in love with the half-caste woman," says Luamerava softly. "This greatly surprises me."

"No, Luamerava, it should not surprise you. You see, we immortals are created to live, mortals are created to love." Hers was the only true love I ever knew and I have traded it for mealies—and a broken heart!

THE MELODY LINGERS

ON reaching the land north of the Utukela river, the Nguni and the Mambo Tribes had set about building new kraals and settling down. But the Xhosa, still led by their High Chief Mxhosa, had pressed on south to settle in the land beyond the Umzimvubu river. New tribes were being formed everywhere as smaller groups broke away—the Hlubi, the Lala, the Tembu and many others, some of which disintegrated before they could leave a mark on history.

Those were momentous days in the history of the Tribes—days of reformation, reorganization and disintegration. And it was during these days that the Zulu nation, destined to rule the whole land east of the Ukahlamba mountains and the territory from as far north as the Upongolo to as far south as the Umkomanzi, was formed.

This story begins with the death of the Great Malandela, father by adoption of the young princes, Zulu and Qwabe. Malandela died violently. He died at the hands of a vengeful girl named Pindisa.

Malandela had just finished building his eight-thousand-hut Royal Kraal which Celiwe named Pelindaba, which means 'the end of the story'. A great feast was in progress on that sunny day and juicy pieces of meat were being roasted by thousands of warriors and large quantities of beer were being drunk. The aroma of roasting and boiling meat was borne on the whispering breeze from the great kraal. The singing and the loud laughter of thousands of men and women could be heard from far away. Everybody was rejoicing and nobody was expecting murder to be committed on such a happy day.

It happened suddenly, leaving many people gaping in disbelief. It happened with the speed of lightning.

It was at the time, as at all feasts, the dancing turns to wildest abandon—when male and female dancers compete fiercely in the centre of the kraal. There was a lithe girl who outdanced them all. She was a dark-brown bolt of sheer abandon, and when the panting dancers sat down one by one, she kept going—leaping, shaking and stamping tirelessly. She outdanced even the great Dambisa-Luwewe. She outdanced even the dwarf Nguni Rainbow Induna Malangabi. She danced nearer to where the two High Chiefs, Mavimbela and Malandela, were sitting. Suddenly, with a loud, ecstatic laugh, she snatched a spear from a warrior standing nearby and drove it twice deep through the heart of Malandela. A shocked silence followed the initial gasps of surprise. The Chieftainess Celiwe was the first person to find voice again. She leapt to the side of her dying consort and tried to hold back the flow of blood with her little hands. The tall, slim girl who had stabbed Malandela stood with hands on her hips, utterly unconcerned at what she had done and utterly unconcerned with what the consequences might be for herself.

"Why?" asked Celiwe, "why did you do this? Why have you murdered him?"

The girl smiled—a cold, terrible smile—and her voice was soft and calm, and very deadly as she said: "Does the name Bekizwe mean anything to you? Do you not remember a man whose name was Bekizwe?"

"Bekizwe was Malandela's brother," Celiwe replied feebly. "But what has he to do with the deed you have done?"

"Bekizwe was my father. My mother escaped with me in her womb on the night when he did to my father what I have now done to him."

The girl Pindisa turned her back contemptuously on Celiwe and strode away. Warriors moved to seize her and she did not bother to resist. Rainbow Indunas closed on her with raised spears but she smiled coldly, contemptuously at them.

A spear was driven into her belly by Malangabi and she fell, too proud and too brave to scream. Spears tore into her and she was still smiling when she died. Pindisa, the daughter of Bekizwe, whose name means 'avenge', had avenged her father's death at last.

* * * * *

Five days later Malandela the Great was buried, and his two surviving Rainbow Indunas, Malangabi and Solozi, who had fought beside him in many bloody battles, stabbed themselves over his grave to go with him—to be beside him in the land of Forever-Night.

Queen Celiwe did not long survive the death of Malandela. A few moons later the wise little queen, who had ruled the Nguni so long and so unselfishly, collapsed and was carried dying into her hut. Her last words were: "Tell Zulu and Qwabe to rule the Nguni jointly . . . and wisely . . ."

Zulu and Qwabe did not rule the Nguni jointly for long. They quarrelled. They quarrelled over the one thing over which all silly fools quarrel—a woman. Qwabe had met and loved a girl who belonged to the break-away Tonga tribe, and he had made up his mind to marry this girl. But she did not love him and always taunted him about his repulsively ugly face.

The girl loved Zulu, Qwabe's handsome younger brother, and just before the day when Qwabe was to have married this girl, Nobantu, Zulu kidnapped her and hid her in the Qudeni mountain. He only produced her a year later, with a baby in her arms—Zulu's baby. This was too much for the gentle Qwabe, who was not by nature a violent man. He seized a knobkierie and brained Nobantu and her baby with it before turning on Zulu. But Zulu escaped and fled with a crowd of followers into the safety of the Nkandla forest. For many years after that Zulu and his followers, who called themselves the Amazulu, carried on a brisk trade with the other tribes in mealies and tobacco. For more than two hundred years this Zulu tribe was nicknamed the 'Vagabond Snuff-sellers'.

* * * * *

I did not witness the death of Malandela, nor that of Celiwe. I could do nothing about the famous quarrel between Zulu and Qwabe.

My women and daughters, and Odu, were captured by the Hordes of Eternity a few days after we saw Lulama-Maneruana off. I had to surrender them to ensure their continued existence in the Upper-world while I continued mine in the Underworld.

I became imprisoned in a crystal world, where I still exist in a dormant phase until the time comes for me to return to the world of men to guide them to further destinies. I could all along keep track of events and I still exercise influence over Guardians of Tribal History. It is I who speak through them.

In the meantime I have been sensing the years go by. I also sense with a sick feeling in my stomach, that the tribes will soon be needing me. The White Men, the latter Strange Ones, have invaded the Lands of the Tribes again in full force, and terrible wars have been fought.

I must get out of here. The gods told me they are going to keep me imprisoned here till the River Time runs dry. But my people need me—I must get out . . .

A dark figure is entering my crystal cavern. I can dimly discern its outline as it gropes and shambles stealthily towards me. I can see its ugly shape moving in the darkness. Hope rises in my heart . . .

POSTSCRIPT

WE have reached the end of a long and tedious story—a strange mixture of historical fact and legendary fantasy, a strange mixture of truth and nonsense.

But, what is included here under the title of "The Journey to Asazi" is only a synopsis, a very greatly shortened synopsis, of what is without any doubt the longest single story in the world. This story is not supposed to have an ending. Each Guardian of his tribe's history is supposed to add to it what his tribe experiences during his lifetime.

A person who is not familiar with Africa and its peoples might find it difficult to understand this story, let alone read between the lines. He might find it difficult to follow all its weird twists and turns, or to appreciate why these are brought in this manner into the story.

It is because the African people do not tell stories the way they are normally told among other races. With a story out of Africa things do not happen the way one expects. Many characters vanish—they simply vanish from the story for no apparent reason. Some of the villains survive as heroes, and one-time heroes are written off with no ceremony at all. African stories follow a standard pattern which dictates that the attention of the listeners must be held. At no time must boredom set in. One must play with the listeners' emotions as one does with a toy doll. Make them laugh, make them cry, make them angry, thwart their expectations, puzzle them one moment, delight them, or repel them, the next. And always leave them with wide open mouths, begging for more.

The earlier parts included under 'The story of Lumukanda' are standard throughout Africa. This section alone has over twenty thousand standard characters, complete with names, descriptions of physical appearance and the nature of their personalities. The story as told under the title 'Journey to Asazi' is specific for the Mambo-Nguni-Xhosa group of tribes and it is only logical that it should differ substantially from similar records in West, Central and East Africa.

This is not a story intended only to entertain the listener; basically it embodies tribal history. But it is presented in the chosen form to maintain interest and avoid boredom. To achieve the latter, flights of fantasy are permissible from time to time; but even these are taken with the express object of preserving for posterity items and episodes of a purely mythological nature—pure folklore. In addition, the story includes elaborate descriptions of all the various ceremonies performed on particular occasions, to ensure that in the course of time each ceremony will be performed precisely in the traditional way. And, of course, the complete story embodies Tribal Law in all its closest detail.

hypocrisy to fact . . . the life of many African tribes is openly and frankly discussed; also their religious beliefs, their crafts and their strange and varied reactions to civilisation today.

This book has already been hailed as an epic that could go a long way towards filling in the great gaps in African history.

❖ Deacon:- For the peace holy things we beseech, that God may grant us peace through His Mercy (3-66)

❖ For our Faith we beseech, that God may grant us to keep the faith in purity. For our congregation we beseech, that God may keep us unto the end in the Communion of the Holy Spirit. For patience of soul we beseech, that God may vouchsafe us perfect patience in all our tribulation For the holy prophets we beseech, that God may number us with them.

- ❖ For the ministering Apostles we beseech, that God may grant us to be well pleasing even as they were well pleasing, apportion unto us a lot with them.
- ❖ For the Holy martyrs we beseech, that God may grant us to perfect the same conversation.

❖ For the deacons we beseech, that God may grant them to run a perfect course, and draw them high unto Him in holiness, and remember their labor and their love.

❖ For the assistant deacons and the anagnostos and the singers we beseech, that God grant them to perfect the diligence of their faith. For the widows and the bereaved we beseech, that God may hear their prayers and vouchsafe them abundantly in their hearts the grace of the Holy Spirit and accept their labor.

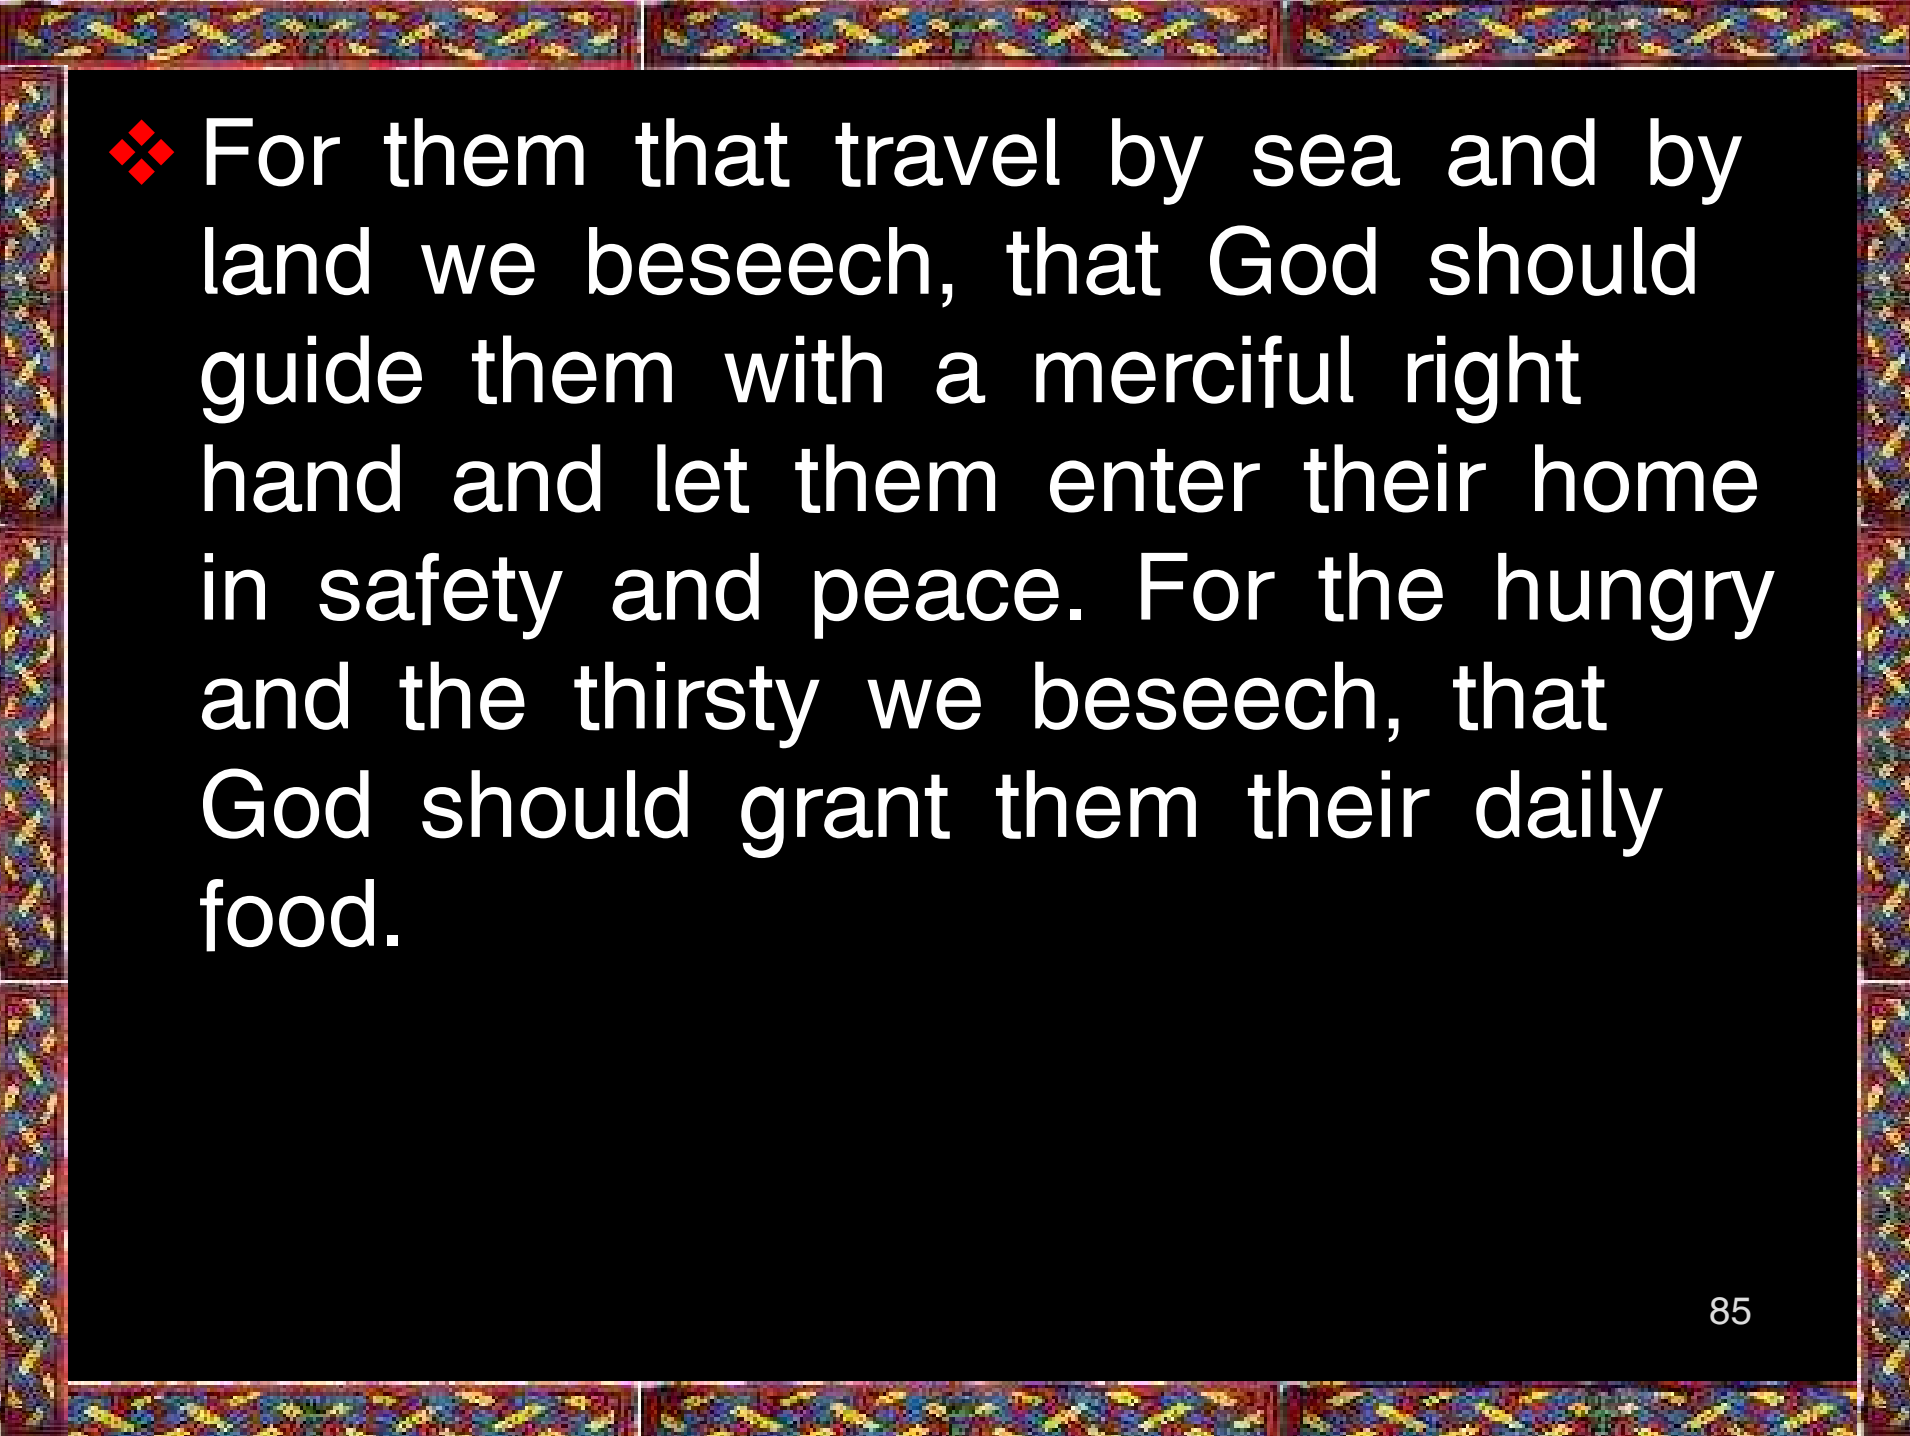

❖ For our Patriarch and the blessed Archbishop we beseech, that grant them length of days to be over us, that with understanding they may rightly speak the word of faith in purity without spot for that they are the defenders of the church.

❖ For the priests we beseech, that God may never take from them the spirit of priesthood, and may give them the grace of zeal and fear of Him unto the end and accept their labor. For the virgins we beseech, that God may grant them the crown of virginity,

❖ and that they may be unto God sons and daughters and that He may accept their labor. For those who suffer patiently we beseech, that God grant them to receive their rewards through patience. For the laity and faithful we beseech, that God may grant them complete faith which they may keep in purity.

- ❖ For the catechumens we beseech, that God may grant them a good portion and the washing of regeneration for the remission of sin, and seal them with the seal of the Holy Trinity.
 - ❖ For our leaders we beseech, that God may vouchsafe them much peace in their days

❖ For the rulers and those in authority we beseech, that God may grant them of His wisdom and His fear. For the whole world we beseech, that God should hasten His purpose and put into the mind of all and each to desire that which is good and expedient

❖ For them that travel by sea and by land we beseech, that God should guide them with a merciful right hand and let them enter their home in safety and peace. For the hungry and the thirsty we beseech, that God should grant them their daily food.

- ❖ For the sad and the sorrowful we beseech, that God may give them perfect consolation.
- ❖ For the captives, we beseech, that God may restore them to their country in peace. For those who were sent away we beseech, that God should grant them complete reward for their labor.

- ❖ For the sick and the diseased we beseech, that God should heal them speedily and send upon them mercy and compassion.
 - ❖ For those who have fallen asleep in his holy church we beseech, that God may vouchsafe them a place to rest.

- ❖ For those who have sinned, our fathers and our brothers we beseech, that God cherish not anger against them, but grant them rest and relief from His wrath.
- ❖ For the rains we beseech, that God may send rain on the place that needs it.

- ❖ For the water of the rivers we beseech, that God should fill them unto their due measure and bounds.
- ❖ For the fruits of the earth we beseech, that God may grant to the earth her fruit for sowing and for harvest.

❖ And all of us who ask and beseech in prayer, may He cover us with the spirit of peace, and give us grace, and enlighten the eyes of our hearts. Let us draw high and ask God to accept our prayers according to His will. For the sad and the sorrowful we beseech, that God may give them perfect consolation

❖ For the captives, we beseech, that God may restore them to their county in peace. For those who were sent away we beseech, that God should grant them complete reward for their labor. For the sick and the diseased we beseech, that God should heal them speedily and send upon them mercy and compassion.

❖ Let us therefore rise in the Holy Spirit, growing in His grace, with understanding, glorying in His name and built upon the foundation of the prophets and the apostles. Let us draw high and ask Lord God to accept our prayers according to His will.

Saint Yared & Religious Music

St. Yared, an Ethiopian scholar and hymnologist rose to prominence by A.D. (Ethiopian Calendar). St. Yared is well known throughout the world for his incomparable knowledge, mastery and composition of hymns and as a prolific “Qene” scholar.

St. Yared has four hymnal books to his credit “Digua”, “Zimare”, “Mewasit”, and “Miraf”. He was also an authority on the interpretation of the Old and New Testaments as well as on other important books. Carefully choosing parts from these important books for use in prayers and hymns, and harmonizing the basic with their interpretation; he arranged them in such a way that they can be prayed and sang in the four seasons for fall, autumn, summer and winter with all the beauty and passion he graced them with. He classified his hymn into three; namely, “Geez”, “Izel” and “Araray”

ORAL AND WRITTEN TRANSMISSION IN ETHIOPIAN CHRISTIAN CHANT*

In memory of Howard Mayer Brown

Of all the musical traditions in the world among which fruitful comparisons with medieval European chant might be made, the chant tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church promises to be especially informative. In Ethiopia one can actually witness many of the same processes of oral and written transmission as were or may have been active in medieval Europe. Music and literacy are taught in a single curriculum in ecclesiastical schools. Future

*This article is a revised and abridged synthesis of three separate papers presented at a session of the same title at the fifty-fourth Annual Meeting of the American Musicological Society at Baltimore, Maryland, in 1988. The material is drawn from a collaborative study carried out by the authors, for which Kay K. Shelemay served as project director, Peter Jeffery as project co-director and Ingrid Monson as research associate. The article has been edited by Kay K. Shelemay; sections written entirely by one member of the research team appear under his or her name, while the introductory and concluding remarks are drawn from all three articles. The authors acknowledge with gratitude a grant from the Research Division of the National Endowment for the Humanities, which supported their work, and the advice of Dr Getatchew Haile, who served as project consultant.

A note on transliteration of Gəʾəz terms: The transliteration system used here eliminates most diacritical markings in order to reduce confusion with notational signs. The seven Ethiopic (Gəʾəz) vowels (referred to as 'orders' when combined with one of the thirty-three basic symbols in the Gəʾəz syllabary) are represented as ε, u, i, a, e, ə and o. To avoid confusion in our transliteration of the written Gəʾəz sources, we have used ε (pronounced 'like the sound one makes while hesitating in speaking and which is represented in writing by "uh"'); W. Leslau, Amharic Textbook (Wiesbaden, 1967), p. 6) for all first-order vowels. The reader should be aware that ε is pronounced like that of the fourth-order (a) ('like the English exclamation "ah"'); Leslau, p. 6) on the laryngeal consonants (ʾ), (ʾ), (ḥ), (h'), (h). Additionally, the normally silent sixth-order vowel (pronounced 'like the "e" in "roses"'); Leslau, p. 7) is often pronounced in musical performance, and the consonants it accompanies often carry notational symbols as well. For this reason, we have included in our transliterations many syllables with sixth-order vowels that would not be articulated in normal speech. Popular spellings are used for modern place, tribal and personal names.

singers begin to acquire the repertory by memorising chants that serve both as models for whole melodies and as the sources of the melodic phrases linked to individual notational signs. At a later stage of training each one copies out a complete notated manuscript on parchment using medieval scribal techniques. But these manuscripts are used primarily for study purposes; during liturgical celebrations the chants are performed from memory without books, as seems originally to have been the case also with Gregorian and Byzantine chant.¹ Finally, singers learn to improvise sung liturgical poetry according to a structured system of rules. If one desired to imitate the example of Parry and Lord,² who investigated the modern South Slavic epic for possible clues to Homeric poetry, it would be difficult to find a modern culture more similar to the one that spawned Gregorian chant.

This article introduces the methods, materials and initial findings of a cross-disciplinary investigation of Ethiopian Christian chant. It was pointed out over twenty years ago that Ethiopian chant 'urgently needs investigating'.³ Although scholars have long studied the history, literature and liturgy of the Ethiopian church,⁴

¹ As late as the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in the West there were regulations obliging singers to perform without books (F. L. Harrison, Music in Medieval Britain, 4th edn (Buren, 1980), pp. 102–3). In the seventeenth century, Jacques Goar observed that 'while singing, the Greeks rarely look at, or even have, books written with musical notes' (E. Wellesz, A History of Byzantine Music and Hymnography, 2nd edn (Oxford, 1961, repr. 1971), pp. 4–5).

⁴ The principal study of Ethiopian church history is Tadesse Tamrat, Church and State in Ethiopia (Oxford, 1972). For the considerable resources on Ethiopian literature, see E. Cerulli, Storia della letteratura etiopica (Milan, 1956); enlarged 3rd edn, La letteratura etiopica (Florence, 1968); Getatchew Haile, 'Religious Controversies and the Growth of Ethiopic Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries', Oriens Christianus, 4th series, 65 (1981), pp. 102–36, and 'A New Look at Some Dates in Early Ethiopian History', Le Muséon, 95/3–4 (1982), pp. 311–22. Ethiopian Christian liturgy is discussed in E. Hammerschmidt, Studies in the Ethiopic Anaphoras, 2nd rev. edn (Stuttgart, 1987); B. Velat, Ṣoma Degguā, antiphonaire du carême, quatre premières semaines: texte éthiopien et variantes, Patrologia Orientalis 32/1–2 (Paris, 1966); idem, Études sur le Me'erāf, commun de l'office divin éthiopien: introduction, traduction française, commentaire liturgique et musical, Patrologia Orientalis 33 (Paris, 1966); idem, Me'erāf, commun de l'office divin éthiopien pour toute l'année: texte éthiopien avec variantes, Patrologia Orientalis 34/1–2 (Paris, 1966); idem, Ṣoma Degguā, antiphonaire du carême, quatre premières semaines: introduction, traduction française, transcriptions musicales, Patrologia Orientalis 32/3–4 (Turnhout, 1969); idem, 'Musique liturgique d'Éthiopie', Encyclopédie des musiques sacrées, ed. which was founded in the mid fourth century, Ethiopian Christian liturgical music has received only intermittent scholarly attention from Ethiopianists.⁵ The few investigations of Ethiopian sacred music (zema) in the musicological literature have combined data derived from Villoteau's landmark study with information from later secondary sources⁶ and, occasionally, the writer's own observations.⁷

To be sure, the Gə'əz language presented a substantial barrier to musicologists wishing to explore the surviving manuscripts. But beyond issues of linguistic competence and area expertise looms a larger epistemological issue. While musicological scholarship developed a sophisticated methodology for deciphering musical notation in manuscripts, it relegated to the area of 'performance practice' considerations of the relationship of notation to the unwritten or 'oral' features of this music. Ethnomusicologists, on the other hand, gained considerable experience in understanding orally transmitted musical traditions but rarely studied the systems of musical notation in which some of these traditions were encoded. This paradoxical situation has begun to change, as medievalists have become interested in the processes of oral transmission and its relationship to the development of Western musical notation.⁸

⁵ A few Ethiopianists attempted to list the notational signs (mäläkkät) they found within manuscripts, but did not investigate the melodies with which the signs were associated: H. Zotenberg, Catalogues des MSS. éthiopiens de la Bibliothèque nationale (Paris, 1877); A. Dillmann, 'Verzeichnis der abessinischen Handschriften', Die Handschriftenverzeichnisse der Kgl. Bibliothek zu Berlin (Berlin, 1878), III, pp. 31–2 and Tafel III; M. Cohen, 'Sur la notation musicale éthiopienne', Studi orientalistici in onore di Giorgio Levi della Vida, I (Rome, 1956), pp. 199ff; Tito Lepisa, 'The Three Modes and the Signs of the Songs in the Ethiopian Liturgy', Proceedings of the Third International Conference of Ethiopian Studies, II (Addis Ababa, 1970), pp. 162–87. An exception is M. Villoteau, 'De la musique (I) des Abyssins ou Éthiopiens', Description de l'Égypte, XXXI (Paris, 1809), pp. 741–54, who both described the melodies of a small group of mäläkkät performed by Ethiopian church musicians he interviewed in Egypt and transcribed several complete liturgical portions in Western notation. B. Velat (see note 4) published musical transcriptions of approximately half of the 500 melodies he recorded from informants during the preparation of his valuable studies of the Ethiopian liturgy (Études sur le Me'eräf, and Šoma Deggua, 1969) but he did not correlate each melody with its respective notational sign.

Meanwhile, ethnomusicologists have shown increasing interest in non-Western notational systems.⁹

There is no doubt that this longstanding methodological impasse contributed to the scholarly neglect of Ethiopian Christian chant, since the only plausible method for studying this music and its notation is to approach them through the surviving oral tradition. Otherwise, the musical meaning of the notational signs and the relationships between them cannot be ascertained. The study of Ethiopian Christian chant and its notational system presented here has as a result drawn upon methods and sources of both ethnomusicology and musicology. The combination of ethnographic, palaeographic and documentary evidence provides a much fuller picture than that possible through only a single disciplinary matrix or set of sources.

Our findings suggest that the Ethiopian oral and written sources have interacted in a flexible yet surprisingly stable manner from at least the sixteenth century to the present. In the following pages we set forth what we have learned of this interaction and trace the new perspectives it provides both of the history and modern practice of this particular chant tradition and of the nature of musical transmission in its relationship to liturgical development, individual creativity and cultural change. In the context of the recent debate on issues of oral transmission, oral composition, memory and the history of notation in Gregorian chant,¹⁰ the Ethiopian notational system also provides additional evidence that may be of broader interest to the scholarly community.

USING MODERN SOURCES TO ACHIEVE HISTORICAL RECONSTRUCTION IN THE STUDY OF ETHIOPIAN CHRISTIAN CHANT

Theory, modern sources and methodology. Most studies of oral transmission, in both music and literature,¹¹ have approached analysis through the examination of stereotyped musical or textual phrases, sometimes termed 'formulas', which are identified by the scholar through their repeated occurrence in surviving written sources. To the best of our knowledge, in prior studies the definition of these stereotyped phrases has been provided by the scholar studying a complete written 'text', whether of a Homeric epic or of a notated plainchant repertory.

In contrast, our analysis takes as its point of departure the smallest structural unit defined by the singer within the Ethiopian tradition we are studying. This unit is the məlǝkkət (sign) of the notational system. Each məlǝkkət consists of one or more members of the Ethiopic syllabary derived from the liturgical text of a well-known 'portion', or section of the chant book known as the Dəggwa, with which a particular melody is primarily associated; the məlǝkkət is placed immediately above words to which its associated melody should be sung. In the case of Ethiopian Christian chant, segmentation arrived at through these indigenous units also provides the critical link between oral and written aspects of the tradition: the məlǝkkət is at once an oral melody and a written sign.¹²

Our understanding of the Ethiopian musician's perception of the məlǝkkət was derived from oral and written materials I gathered during fieldwork in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, with Eləqa Berhanu Makonnen, the musician in charge of all church musical activity and the accreditation of its musicians. He is a leading exponent of the vocal style predominating in the modern church, called the 'Bethlehem style' after the northern Ethiopian monastery with which it is associated, and his knowledge and performance practice exemplify both normative and virtuoso aspects of the Ethiopian chant tradition.¹³

In addition to systematically explaining aspects of Ethiopian Christian liturgical and musical practice, and performing chants drawn from all the major service books for all occasions in the annual liturgical cycle, Ēlēqa Berhanu gave me a complete list of the notational signs (məḏləkkəḏt) that he had prepared for his classes at the Theological College in Addis Ababa and sang the melody associated with each sign. I tape-recorded all these sessions in full, which has facilitated the transcription, analysis and presentation of this material years after the primary research was completed.

Berhanu's list, of which I received a photocopy, was a mimeographed Amharic typescript on legal-size paper (8.5 × 14 in) incorporated within a longer document he had compiled entitled 'Səḏəqəddus Yared Tarik' (n.d.; 'Concerning the History of St Yared', hereafter SYT). The remainder of SYT contains an account of the life of St Yared (see below for discussion of his significance), explanation of the modal system, portion types and additional notational signs. Berhanu reports that he compiled SYT for his second-year Theological College students and that the list of notational signs was derived from a combination of his received knowledge of the notational system and from a review of the signs found in notated manuscripts in his possession.¹⁴

Compiled in writing as well as performed, this composite oral and written document revealed to us the materials of the Ethiopian

¹⁴ Interview, 2 June 1975, and correspondence with the author, 15 December 1988. Berhanu Makonnen's SYT, including the list of notational signs, appears to rely at least in part on the source or sources also used to prepare an obscure Theological College publication entitled Yeḡəddus Yared Tarikənnā Yeḡemaw Məḏləkkəḏtoch (1959 E.C. [1967; hereafter YYTYM]). The complicated relationship between these two documents is discussed in detail in K. K. Shelemay and P. Jeffery, Ethiopian Christian Liturgical Chant: an Anthology, 1 (Madison, WI, forthcoming). Germane to the discussion here is the fact that both SYT and YYTYM appear to be only two of several attempts to list systematically the notational signs beginning in the 1960s, a development perhaps stimulated by pedagogical demands in the urban environment.

Christian musical and notational system. Furthermore, the structure of Berhanu's testimony set forth irrefutable evidence that a minimal structural unit, the mələkkət, existed in the mind of the Ethiopian musician, providing both a central hypothesis and the basis of a working methodology for our research. However, our dependence upon Berhanu's list of mələkkət raised other issues regarding the goals of this study and the management of the data that merit discussion.

The first issue is the nature of the relationship between an individual's knowledge of a tradition and the dimensions of the musical system at large. We have chosen to rely upon Eḷeqa Berhanu's view of the Ethiopian musical system as the anchor of our project because it is the only feasible way to sketch the boundaries of a tradition that necessarily vary from person to person. On a broader cultural level as well, Ethiopian concepts of the importance of the individual and the consistent emphasis on and respect for hierarchy supports such an approach.¹⁵ This project therefore should be viewed on its most specific level as an effort to trace the major parameters of the normative Ethiopian Christian chant tradition in the late twentieth century, as understood and practised by one of its most accomplished musicians.

Aware of the limitations inherent in a study depending upon one main informant, I also recorded from Eḷeqa Berhanu and two other debteras (church musicians) the same sample of fifty-seven mələkkət and selected liturgical portions from different service books. The other two musicians lived in the Ethiopian capital but were trained in schools of vocal style (Qoma and Achaber [probably Ach'abər]) associated with two different monasteries in north-western Ethiopia. This comparative material, discussed below by Ingrid Monson, confirms the existence of a shared core of notational and performance practice that transcends individual knowledge and schools of training, while graphically demonstrating the range of variation acceptable in performance of the Ethiopian chant tradition.

A second issue raised by the data from the oral tradition relates to the complexity of the Ethiopian Christian musical system. The 558 notational signs are divided into three categories of mode (səlt, literally ‘mode, manner, style’),¹⁶ or, more generally, zema, ‘chant, church song’, with 287 signs in the gəʾəz mode (abbreviated G1–287), 142 signs in eraray (abbreviated A1–142), and 129 in ‘əz/ (abbreviated E1–129). The melodies associated with the signs are the building-blocks of the three modes and the smallest musical units discussed by Ethiopian Christian musicians. Thus issues of modality, which involve significant differences in pitch set, range, melodic contour, ornamentation and vocal style, become quite important in any discussion of the mələkkət. Conversely, this study of the mələkkət necessarily serves to illuminate and define the parameters of mode in this musical tradition.

The notation also provides insight into many aspects of musical and liturgical structure. In addition to the 558 mələkkət, there is a group of 114 signs called bet (literally, ‘house’, abbreviated B1–114), also derived from the syllabary. The bet appear in margins to indicate the ‘family’ of melody within a mode to which the particular chant melody belongs. There are also ten conventional signs, termed yəfdel qərs, that prescribe aspects of articulation, attack, decay, or placement of individual pitches or melodic patterns; they appear as interlinear signs interspersed between the mələkkət (see Table 1). Yet another notational component is references within the texts to the halleluya tables (Enqes’e Halleta) that indicate to which melody a halleluya should be sung; these melodies derive from the bet system. A final type of notational symbol is a number placed in the margin, called mədgam, which signals the singer to repeat that portion of text with instrumental accompaniment and dance.¹⁷ To understand the mələkkət, therefore, is to confront the entire Ethiopian Christian musical system. Indeed, it can be argued that it is probably impossible to explicate fully Ethiopian Christian liturgical music without an understanding of the mələkkət and the other notational signs.

¹⁶ Definitions are drawn from W. Leslau, Concise Amharic Dictionary (Wiesbaden, 1976), pp. 48, 179. Gəʾəz ceased to be a spoken language about the twelfth or thirteenth century; much of the terminology for Ethiopian music theory is therefore actually in Amharic, a related language that has become the official vernacular of modern Ethiopia.

¹⁷ During the research sessions, all chants were sung without accompaniment as qum zema (‘basic chant’). When performed in liturgical context during the offices that precede the Mass, certain chants are first sung unaccompanied and then repeated several times, accompanied in each subsequent rendition by the motion of the prayer staff (məqamiya), the rhythms of the sistrum (s’enas’əl) and drum (kəbēro), and liturgical dance (eqqwaqwa).

^a According to Berhanu Makonnen, ch'əret and qənat share a sign. Velat does not list qənat, but provides the same sign for ch'əret as does Berhanu (Études sur le Me'eraf (see note 4), p. 101). Lepisa presents ch'əret as) and qənat as Ḥ (Lepisa, 'The Three Modes' (see note 5), p. 168). Although the cadential markers dərs and ənəbər are classified as conventional signs, they are represented by characters from the syllabary; dərs is additionally included in the list of məḥkəḥ as G261.

A third issue relates to the sheer amount of material provided by Berhanu Makonnen. Ələqa Berhanu sang all the notational symbols in his repertory, including the bet and yefidel qərs', as well as over a thousand liturgical chants from the major service books. Because of the amount of material and the plethora of liturgical books and occasions involved, we decided to focus this initial inquiry primarily on the chants of the Dəggwa, the most important collection as well as Berhanu Makonnen's primary area of specialisation.¹⁸ The Dəggwa is performed before the Mass on Sundays and holidays throughout the liturgical cycle. These chants form the non-monastic or 'Cathedral' Office, the most important occasion for music in the Ethiopian liturgy.

Our intent was to gain an overview of musical practice while learning in as much detail as possible what we could of the development of the notational system. Since a 'reading' of notation in manuscripts is clearly impossible without knowledge of the oral tradition, we numbered all signs of the notational system from Berhanu's list and transcribed their melodies in a 'dictionary'. We then used this apparatus to analyse eighteen sample portions, balancing the choice to incorporate (1) a cross-section of liturgical occasions; (2) a representative sampling of portion types; (3) examples from the three modal categories; and (4) inclusion of portions with possible concordances in other Ethiopian and Eastern Christian traditions.¹⁹

Since this study employs an unorthodox methodology of working from the contemporary oral tradition backwards into manuscript sources, it seems appropriate to detail here our analytical procedures. Using the dictionary of signs constructed from 𐌖𐌙𐌐𐌐 Berhanu's list, I identified the signs in the modern printed *Mes'h'afe Dəggwa*²⁰ from which 𐌖𐌙𐌐𐌐 Berhanu sang. At the same time, I compared the dictionary entry for each sign with 𐌖𐌙𐌐𐌐 Berhanu's realisation of the signs in performances of the complete portions, which I had also transcribed into Western musical notation. Meanwhile, Peter Jeffery used Berhanu Makonnen's list of signs to identify the mələkkət for each of the sample portions in a carefully selected group of manuscripts. After this first stage, we worked together to arrive at a final reading of the notation for each portion in all sources, checking Jeffery's reading of the notated manuscripts against my analysis of both the modern written sources and performance. We found that evidence from the dictionary of signs, the manuscripts, the modern notated books, musical transcriptions of complete portions, and Berhanu's explanations combined to provide an effective control on our readings of mələkkət from any single written source. Only occasionally were we unable to identify a sign after consulting our sources as well as the lists and transcriptions of signs prepared by others.²¹

Identification of the signs led in turn to consideration of a number of interpretative and historical issues. These can be illustrated briefly through discussion of one portion from our sample.

¹⁹ The many issues raised by the process of transcribing both the Ethiopian mələkkət and the eighteen sample portions into Western staff notation are too complex for treatment here and are discussed at length in Shelemay and Jeffery, Ethiopian Christian Liturgical Chant.

Oral and written transmission in Ethiopian Christian chant

Example 2. Bet 41 (source: performed by Berhanu Makonnen, 4 June 1975)

Issues in analysis and interpretation. Here we shall examine the first portion of the Dəggwa, chanted on St John's day, the beginning of the liturgical year.²² This chant is of particular analytical interest because Berhanu Makonnen, at my request, sang both the entire portion and then its constituent signs in order. Berhanu's 'analysis' of the signs in this portion helped us to answer some questions, and raised others in turn.

This portion, here termed portion 1, is preceded by a halleluya that corresponds to the first entry in the Halleta table under 'one halleluya'. There is also a bet indicated for this portion in the left-hand margin, yəḏ, B41 (see also Example 2). Comparison of Examples 1 and 2 indicate that the melody of the halleluya, ornamented with vocal slides termed rəkrək, deviates considerably from the prescribed bet. This variation can probably be attributed to the tradition of elaborating chant incipits, especially one occurring at such an important point in the liturgy. This portion also contains separate notation at the end for a slightly varied repetition of the text, called a məlt'an, extending from the words wəḏstē rə'əse to the end. The məlt'an notation here varies only on the words tezkardke and ənṣa'ə.

Although portion 1 contains a greater number of conventional signs (yefidel qərs') than alphabetic signs (mələkkəti), most of the melodic activity can be accounted for by the mələkkəti alone. Comparison of notation for this portion in the manuscripts and modern printed sources demonstrates that the same sign may be represented by different characters from the same source text. That is, in one manuscript the sign may consist of the first two characters of its source text, while in another it will be represented by the final two characters, or some other combination. Such an example from our demonstration portion 1 can be seen in the notation of

G119 on the word s'elli. G119 is derived from the source text εwgθr (ከወ ግር), and is most commonly represented by the sign wē (ወ) as seen here in Figure 2. Yet in two of the manuscripts (16D and 18D, see Jeffery below) in our sample, G119 is represented by the sign gθr (ግር). In this case, it appears that the notational symbol itself changed over time, yet regional custom or individual idiosyncrasy may provide equally plausible explanations for such differences in other instances.

Some māḏlākkāṭi may be confused in manuscripts as well as in performance simply because their source words are similar. See G269 (geset, Example 3), the number which we have identified as the sign actually performed in the rendition transcribed in Example 1 despite the appearance of G200 (geṣe) in most of the manuscripts as well as the modern Dəggwa (20D, shown in Figure 2) from which Ǝleqa Berhanu sang. Although Ǝleqa Berhanu read notation for məḷəkkət G200, he actually sang G269. While in this case we can confirm the substitution because Berhanu sang both the portion and its constituent signs separately, we believe this is not an uncommon event.

In some cases Ǝleqa Berhanu's performance suggests that an older melodic tradition persists despite a change in the notation. This may be true of the first sign in the portion, G186 (kah), which remains constant throughout its notational history except for the inclusion of sign G88 (z'u) in our MS 16A. Comparison of dictionary entries (see Example 4) with the modern performance (Example 1) indicates that the melody of G88 may actually match the modern performance as closely as that of G186.

Finally, in a number of cases, we have found a close melodic relationship between the dictionary entries for different signs used on the same word in a portion. For example, G11 (leṣ) is consistently used on the word zehellewekke throughout our entire manuscript sample, while in one modern service book the melodically similar G60 (qu) is substituted (see Example 5). Additionally, the signs G86 (bur) and G17 (leḡe), appearing on the word teṣkarəke, have similar melodies (see Example 6). Their use may represent an intentional redundancy or slightly different options presented to the singer. Similar close relationships may have existed between signs in the past as well, and thus signs with similar melodies may have been freely substituted for each other.

This brief analysis is intended to demonstrate that deciphering the mələkkət is an interpretative and not a mechanical act. Berhanu's list of mələkkət, and his performance of their melodies, provides a lens through which we can glimpse the inner workings of the Ethiopian Christian musical system. It allows us to describe the relationship between sign, source text and melody, and to reconstruct aspects of their interaction over time. Yet it must be emphasised that there is both intentional flexibility and unintentional confusion in use of the signs in manuscripts. Variation in performance practice by the singer introduces yet another level of differentiation that itself may eventually 'feed back' into the creation of a modified or new sign.

It is quite clear that the creativity of the individual musician is the critical link in the history of Ethiopian chant, with individuals like Berhanu Makonnen serving to consolidate, perform and transmit their knowledge of the musical system and its notation to the next generation. An individual debtera, especially one whose own knowledge serves as a model for others, can indeed effect changes in chant performance and notation. A debtera selects the precise Dəggwa portions to be performed on a given day from those of the required type and mode, and through this act may make decisions that ultimately promulgate specific texts and their associated melodies. As he copies his own Dəggwa, each man records his own understanding of the tradition in a source that may later influence others. Yet while the individual plays a potentially powerful role in transmitting and performing Ethiopian chant, and the system itself accommodates some flexibility, strong constraints have always encouraged and continue to guide the individual singer, who is taught to respect the models received from his own teacher, to obey the laws of the larger tradition of which he was a part and, ultimately, to revere the memory of St Yared.

Oral and written sources for the history of Ethiopian chant.

Nowhere does the Ethiopian Christian musical tradition acknowledge the role of the individual more than in its collective commemoration of St Yared, to whose inspiration is attributed the genesis of the Ethiopian chant tradition in the sixth century.²³ The Ethiopian Church celebrates a day each year in honour of St Yared, and colourful tales concerning his life and creative activity are recorded in the Ethiopian *Synaxarion*²⁴ and the *Gedle Yared*²⁵.

Although oral traditions credit Yared with creating at least some of the məḋəkkət,²⁶ and a few written sources do mention music writing as one of his contributions,²⁷ we have found no məḋəkkət in any manuscript dating before the sixteenth century. Therefore, traditions concerning two sixteenth-century church musicians who are said to have codified the notational system assume great significance.

An Ethiopian royal chronicle records that ‘at the time of King Geladewos [1540–59] there appeared Azzaj Gera and Azzaj Ragu’el, priests trained in zema. And they began to make rules for the mǝlǝkkǝt of the Dǝggwa and taught the priests of Tǝdbabe Maryam, which this prince had built’.²⁸ A manuscript (EMML 2045) copied at the northern Ethiopian monastery of Hayq during the reign of Emperor Iyasu 1 (1682–1706) presents a somewhat different and lengthier description concerning Gera and Ragu’el’s contribution, attributing it to a command of Emperor Sers’e Dǝngǝl (1563–97) and crediting the clerics with revising the Dǝggwa in the face of opposition within the church at that time.²⁹

Documentary sources therefore strongly suggest that the clerics who lived and worked immediately following the Muslim invasion of Ethiopia (1529–41) were responsible at the very least for reconstruction and revision of the Ethiopian Christian notational system. This invasion, which led to the widespread destruction of churches and monasteries, and deprived Ethiopia of much of its literary heritage, must have severely disrupted liturgical performance and musical transmission.

In addition to the documentary sources, oral traditions also point to the mid sixteenth century as a period of revival in the church musical tradition. The pre-eminence of the musical style associated with the Bethlehem monastery is said to date from that period, precisely because it was the only place a notated Dǝggwa survived the Muslim invasion.³⁰ Both the documentary sources and

A chronicle cited in Velat, Soma Deggua (1966), p. 98, dates the two clerics to the reign of Geladewos (1540–59), while the rule of Sers’e Dǝngǝl is given in a St Petersburg MS described in C. Conti Rossini, ‘Aethiopica (IIa Series)’, Rivista degli Studi Orientali, 10 (1925), pp. 515–16, after B. Turaev, Ethiopskiya rukopisi v S.-Peterburge [Ethiopian Manuscripts in St Petersburg; in Russian], Zapiski Vostochnago Otdeleniya Imperatorskago Russkago Arkheologicheskago Obshchestva [Memoirs of the Oriental Section of the Imperial Russian Archaeological Society] 17 (1906), pp. 179–82.

³⁰ Berhanu Makonnen transmits a genealogy of Yared’s successors and credits a debtera named Lǝssane Ǿphrat, a student dated by oral tradition to the eighth generation after Yared, with having notated a Dǝggwa during the reign of Emperor Zēr’a Ya’ǧqob surviving oral traditions therefore do at least raise the possibility that the sixteenth-century notational innovations may have drawn upon a pre-invasion model, perhaps one that arose a century earlier as part of an enormous surge of literary activity during the reign of Emperor Zēr'a Ya'eqob (1434–68). However, we have not yet found any other firm evidence for this earlier dating.

We therefore suggest that many aspects of the modern notational system, as well as the hegemony of the Bethlehem musical style, date primarily from a period of renewal beginning after the Muslim invasion in the mid to late sixteenth century. Notation evidently emerged within a relatively short period after a major calamity, setting into motion a period of innovation that climaxed in the seventeenth century. Below, Peter Jeffery sets forth the manuscript evidence supporting this hypothesis.

THE MANUSCRIPT EVIDENCE
(13TH–20TH CENTURIES)

Because the following discussion is the first attempt to trace the history of Ethiopian chant from written primary sources, it can do no more than locate tentatively some of the most prominent chronological landmarks in what has up to now been almost completely uncharted territory. In order to provide some objective basis for dating the various features of the chant and tracing their development, it was necessary first to assemble a corpus of datable chant manuscripts going back as far as possible. This was done by consulting published manuscript catalogues; the manuscripts chosen are listed in Table 2. While a few of the manuscripts listed (1434–68). According to this tradition, only Lāssane ʿEphrat's notated Dəggwa survived the Islamic invasion in a place near the Bethlehem monastery. As a result, the emperor decreed that Bethlehem should be the place where Dəggwa training would be centred (interview, 3 September 1975, and SYT, p. 4). Others have gathered similar traditions, including one concerning a search for surviving liturgical books during the reign of Emperor Sers'e Dəngəl (1563–97) which discovered a Dəggwa and other service books at the Bethlehem monastery (B. Velat, 'Chantres, poètes, professeurs: les dābtara éthiopiens', Cahiers Coptes, no. 5 (Cairo, 1954), p. 27).

are owned by European libraries, the majority are widely scattered in many locations throughout Ethiopia, some of them quite inaccessible rural monasteries. Fortunately these are available on microfilm through EMMML, the Ethiopian Manuscript Microfilm Library in Addis Ababa and Collegeville, Minnesota.³¹ From the seventeenth century to the present it was possible to select sources that can be dated to a very short span of years, because they contain prefaces or colophons that give specific dates or name the reigning kings and bishops. No such information is found in the extant manuscripts of the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries, which can only be dated more broadly by means of palaeographical evidence. However for this early period almost every known manuscript of the main chant collection (the Dəggwa) has been included in the list.³² Ethiopian manuscripts older than the fifteenth century are quite rare; most of the earlier sources that may once have existed seem to have been destroyed in the wars with Muslim and other invaders that took place at that time.

The formation of the Ethiopian chantbook (Dəggwa). The Ethiopian repertory contains about two dozen categories of chants that Western scholars like to call ‘antiphons’, because they somewhat resemble the antiphons of Gregorian chant in length and textual content. The Ethiopian word for them (er’əste Dəggwa) means ‘chapters’ or ‘portions’, that is to say sections of the complete chant book, which is called the Dəggwa, a name of uncertain etymology. It is impossible to say precisely how many categories³³ because Macomber, ‘The Present State of the Microfilm Collection of the Ethiopian Manuscript Microfilm Library’, Ethiopian Studies: Proceedings of the Sixth International Conference, Tel Aviv, 14–17 April 1980, ed. G. Goldenberg (Rotterdam and Boston, 1986).

³² One MS that was not included is a Dəggwa of the sixteenth or seventeenth century, listed as MS 24 in J. Flemming, ‘Die neue Sammlung abessinischer Handschriften auf der Königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin’, Zentralblatt für Bibliothekswesen, 23 (1906), p. 13. Another, Uppsala, Universitetsbiblioteket MS O Ethiop. 37 is a Sōmē Dəggwa copied some time between the mid sixteenth and the late seventeenth century. See O. Löfgren, Katalog über die äthiopischen Handschriften in der Universitätsbibliothek Uppsala (Stockholm, 1974), pp. 75–9; S. ³³ The number of genres is said to be 22 in the Amharic treatise in Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Cod. Aeth. 244, fols. 9–12; see S. Grébaut and E. Tisserant, Codices aethiopici vaticani et Borgiani, Barberiniani Orientalis 2, Rossianus 865, 2 vols. (Vatican City, 1935–6), p. 754. Velat (Soma Degguu, 1969, pp. xv–xviii) also gives this number, but shows that some genres have more than one name, or fall into subgroups with different names.

Table 3 The main types of portion or 'antiphon' in Ethiopian chant

- I. Used to begin an office hour or a structural unit within an office hour:
 - A. Wazema ('Vespers'), sung at the beginning of Vespers
 - B. Məzmur ('Psalm'), sung at the beginning of Sunday Matins (Məwəddəṣ)
 - C. Əbun ('Our Father'), sung at the beginning of Lauds and the Little Hours on weekdays
 - D. 'əzl (named for its mode), sung at the beginning of Lauds (Səbh'etə nəgh)
 - II. Ecstatic chants which precede some of the above types on certain days:
 - A. Əryam ('Highest Heaven') can precede məzmur or abun
 - B. Əngərgari ('Frenzy?') or məlt'an ('litany') can precede məzmur or 'əzl or even replace wazema
 - C. Məsbak ('Proclamation') can precede wazema
 - III. Chants preceded by the refrain of Ps 135 [136]: 'Quoniam in aeternum misericordia eius [For his mercy endures forever]':
 - A. Əsmə lə-'aləm ('Quoniam in aeternum'), sung at Lauds
 - B. Qənnəwat ('Nails' [of the Cross]), sung at the Little Hours
 - IV. Chants named for the type of stanza used in the accompanying psalm:
 - A. Bə-ħəmməstu ('in 5'), with stanzas of five lines
 - B. Ərba't ('fourth'), with stanzas of four lines
 - C. Šələst ('third'), with stanzas of three lines
 - V. Chants sung with specific psalms or canticles of the Ethiopian Psalter, from the incipits of which they take their names:
 - A. Əgzi'əbh'er nəgše ('Dominus regnavit') with Ps 92 [93] at Vespers
 - B. Yətbarek ('Benedictus') with Daniel 3:52–6 at Vespers and Lauds
 - C. Zə-əmlakiyə ('of Deus meus') sung with Ps 62 [63] at Matins and Ps 21 [22] at Lenten Sext
 - D. Zə-yə'əze ('of Nunc [dimittis]') sung with Luke 2:29–32 at Lauds
 - E. Mah'let ('Canticle') sung with Daniel 3:57–88 at Lauds
 - F. Səbh'etə nəgh ('Glorification of the Morning') sung with Psalms 148–50 at Lauds
 - VI. 'Responsorial' chants (collected in a book called Məwəṣṭ)
 - A. Məwəṣṭ ('Responses') sung before Gospel in morning office on important days and in services for the dead
 - VII. Chant sung at the end of each office
 - A. Šəlam ('Peace')
 - VIII. Communion chants sung at Mass (collected in a book called Zəmmare)
 - A. Zəmmare ('Psalmody'), həbəst ('Bread') or səga ('Flesh')
 - B. Səwa' ('Chalice') or dəm ('Blood')
 - C. Mənfes ('Spirit')

VII. Chants used during Holy Week to replace improvised liturgical poetry (qene), from the categories of which they take their names:
A. Mibezhu ('Quid multiplicati sunt'), sung with Ps 3 at Matins
B. Meweddəs, named for Sunday Matins when it is sung
C. Kwəlləkəmu, a short Meweddəs
D. Kəbr yə'əti ('Gloria haec'), sung at Ps 149:9b
E. 'ət'ane mogeɾ ('toss of incense')

they are not mutually exclusive: some overlap with others, some are subdivisions of larger and more varied categories, and some are called by different names in different manuscripts or in different liturgical circumstances. The liturgical characteristics of the various categories are not the subject of this paper; they are summarised in Table 3 and will be discussed at length in a forthcoming book.³⁴ When only musical characteristics are considered, however, many of the two dozen categories of portions can be classified into one of two groups, which I have labelled 'Type I' and 'Type II', as shown in Table 4. Those that belong to neither type are grouped artificially under 'III'.

The earliest manuscripts in our list are devoted to collections of individual categories of portions rather than to the complete Dəggwa repertory. There were two possible ways of organising such a collection: either by melodic group, somewhat as in a Western tonary, or according to the days and times when the portions are sung over the course of the liturgical year. Thus both 13A and 15A are collections restricted to the ərbaʿt category, but the former is arranged by melodic group, while the latter is in liturgical order. 14A contains chants of several categories closely related to the məzmur, arranged by liturgical year. 15B contains fragmentary collections of about ten different categories, brought together into a single disordered volume. Some of its collections have the melodic arrangement, others the liturgical one. Only with 15C do we have for the first time a true Dəggwa, with all the chant texts of almost all categories arranged according to the liturgical year, comparable to the Western antiphoner or the Eastern tropologion. The Dəggwa has remained the most important type of chant book down to the present, though its contents naturally continued to develop and change. In the eighteenth century it became normal to omit the chants for Lent from the complete Dəggwa, collecting them instead into a separate book, the S'omē Dəggwa or Dəggwa of the Fast.³⁵ But Lent was already omitted from some earlier sources, for instance our 17A. The tendency to put the Lenten material in a separate book may have been encouraged by the fact that another season, estemhəro ('teaching'), expanded considerably during the seventeenth century, partly by reduplicating portions borrowed from Lent. Some categories of chant, notably the məwaḳə't (responses), zəmmare (psalmody) and certain categories of liturgical poetry, continued to be transmitted in collections that were independent of the Dəggwa.³⁶ The liturgical psalter (Mə'əraf) is also a separate book; its original core, the psalms arranged and notated for chanting in the liturgy, has attracted some other material used for training the singers.³⁷ Although manuscripts of the Dəggwa and other collections continue to be copied on parchment even in the twentieth century, as an essential part of the training of Ethiopian singers,³⁸ printed chant books began to appear in the 1960s, most of them facsimiles of manuscripts copied in the 1940s and 1950s. The sources 20D, 20E, 20F and 20G in Table 2 fit into this category; both the date of printing and the date of the writing of the original manuscript (where known) are given in the Table.³⁹

³⁸ Sergew Hable Selassie, Bookmaking in Ethiopia (Leiden, 1981), p. 28. On p. 33 is an interesting list showing the amount of time taken to copy the various liturgical and chant books; a Dəggwa takes eighteen months. R. Curzon, who visited an Ethiopian monastery in Egypt in 1833, described traditional copying practices and published a sketch of the monastery library: Visits to Monasteries in the Levant, 5th edn (London, 1865, repr. with an introduction by J. J. Norwich, London, 1983), pp. 134–42. He reported, probably with some exaggeration, that 'One page is a good day's work' (p. 140). See also Velat, 'Chantres, poètes, professeurs'.

³⁹ Unless otherwise specified, dates in these articles are given according to the Gregorian calendar as used in North America and western Europe. The calendar followed in Ethiopia, which derives ultimately from the calendar of Pharaonic Egypt, is seven years behind the Gregorian from 11 September to 31 December, and eight years behind for the remainder of the year (E. Ullendorff, The Ethiopians: an Introduction to Country and People, 3rd edn (London, 1973), p. 177).

^aRoman numerals denote centuries.

The ‘Type I’ portions. The Type I group includes three categories, the erbaʿt, eryam and leleṣt. Each is distinct from the other two in terms of textual form, melodic content and liturgical function. Yet all three have a similar history, which is included in the chronology in Table 5. 13A is a collection of one of these three categories, the erbaʿt, representing what I call ‘Stage I’. In 13A we find the texts arranged according to their melodic groups, that is to say they are grouped with other texts sung to similar melodies, each group headed by the rubric bezemahu (‘in its [own] melody’), zehime bezemahu (‘this also in its [own] melody’), or sḍreyu (the meaning of this term will be discussed below). Within each melodic group the texts are arranged in the order of the liturgical year. 15B includes, among other things, collections of texts belonging to all three categories of Type I, arranged by melodic group as in 13A. In Figure 3 we can see, after the third line of text, a line indicating the beginning of a new melodic group. After that line is the rubric ‘This also in its own melody’, meaning that all the texts that follow belong to the same melody, or rather melodic family. The individual portions of the group follow, arranged in the liturgical order of their feasts, separated from each other by rubrics and by obeli or ‘daggers’ in the margin. There has, however, been a new development, ‘Stage II’. In each melodic group in 15B, one portion has been singled out to serve as representative of the entire group; its name is written in the top margin of the page the group begins on, apparently in the hand of the original scribe. The incipit of the group representative, which in Figure 3 is ‘On this day’, is followed by the words ‘in which one would say’, meaning that the melody of ‘On this day’ serves as the typical one for this entire group of portions. Sometimes the first chant in the group (i.e. the one that appears earliest in the liturgical year) was chosen arbitrarily to represent the entire group. But in other cases, as in Figure 3, a chant from elsewhere in the group was chosen, evidently because it was somehow considered a more appropriate representative of the group as a whole. These group representatives were dubbed ‘melodic models’ (‘modèles mélodiques’) by Velat.⁴⁰ We continue to use this term until such time as a more profound understanding of them may suggest a more appropriate one.

⁴⁰ Études sur le Meʿerāf, pp. 232ff.

Already in 15A, in which the erba't portions are arranged according to the liturgical year, each text is preceded by the text incipit of its group representative or 'melodic model', written in red. The page shown in Figure 4 contains chants for the feast of the archangel Gabriel, each portion separated by a line. But each is preceded by a rubric indicating its melodic group. The three melodic groups shown here, 'On this day', 'John cried out' and 'At that time it was Sabbath' are each followed by the traditional formula 'in which one would say'. The practice of giving the name of the melodic model in red before every text in the same group was continued in 15C, our earliest Dəggwa, and in all other Dəggwa manuscripts down to the present. It is interesting that the second model, 'John cried out', does not occur in more recent sources; its group has either disappeared or adopted a different portion for its model.

The practice of preceding a text with the name of a melody – a name derived from the incipit of a different text deemed the 'model' – will inevitably remind chant scholars of the Byzantine heirmos or the Syriac resh qala. As will be shown below, however, the relationship between an Ethiopian 'model' and its 'derivative' can be much looser, with much of the resemblance concentrated towards the beginning. The full range of possible relationships will not be known until there have been exhaustive studies comparing selected models with their complete 'family' of derivatives.

In 'Stage III' the texts of the melodic models themselves were being assembled into written lists. By the seventeenth century these lists were beginning to be written down and incorporated into an emerging type of liturgical book known as the Mə'raf ('sections' or 'stopping-places'), which primarily contains texts of the psalms pointed and notated for liturgical chanting. Our MS

17B appears to be one of the earliest examples.⁴¹ The primarily oral character of these lists is still evident, however. Boys training to be ecclesiastical singers work at memorising both the texts and their melodies during the night when it is impossible to read. For this reason the lists, along with certain other material to be memorised, are called Ye-qal Təmhərt ('Oral Studies') or Ye-mata Təmhərt ('Night Studies').⁴²

The 'Type II' portions. A much greater variety of categories makes up what I call Type II, listed in Table 4. It subdivides into further groups on the basis of a simple difference in performance practice. The categories of Type IIA, the first three of which are partly interchangeable, are usually preceded by the word 'halleluya', sung from one to ten times according to standard melodic formulas. The categories of Type IIB are preceded instead by one rendition of the refrain of Psalm 135, 'əsmē lē-ʿalēm məh'əretu' ('For his mercy endures forever'). Type IIC includes one of the three types of communion hymns. It is preceded by the Gospel verse 'For nothing is impossible with God' (Luke 1:37), apparently referring to the miraculous transsubstantiation of the eucharistic bread and wine.

The earliest collection of Type II portions, 14A, is arranged by liturgical year. It seems to show that the various subcategories of this type were perhaps not fully differentiated. On every feast there is a series of chant texts, including some that later manuscripts would assign to the mezmur or ebun categories, others that would later be assigned to the əsmē lē-ʿalēm category, and sometimes a few that would later belong to other Type II categories. Rubrics indicating the category are rare in this manuscript, and there are no markings of any kind to separate the mezmur texts from the əsmē lē-ʿalēm ones, which in any case are often intermingled. One can often recognise a mezmur or ebun text because it will be preceded by a numeral indicating the number of times the word 'halleluya' should be sung at the beginning, but this does not mean that any text lacking such a number must be an ḁsmē lē-‘alēm. In a few places wazema and ‘ḁzl’ texts are clearly designated as such by a rubric (e.g. fol. 48a), but in other places they are not. The one type of category that seems to be consistently identified in the manuscript is the qḁnnḁwat, which always comes at the very end of the series of chants assigned to each feast. In later sources of the Dḁggwa, on the other hand, the three series of mezmur or ebun texts, ḁsmē lē-‘alēm texts and qḁnnḁwat texts will be fully segregated from each other, with each series clearly identified by a rubric at the beginning.

⁴¹ Berlin, Staatsbibliothek Preussischer Kulturbesitz, MS orient. oct. 1268 (= Hs. 40 in the catalogue of E. Hammerschmidt and V. Six, Äthiopische Handschriften, 1: Die Handschriften der Staatsbibliothek Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Verzeichnis der orientalischen Handschriften in Deutschland, xx/4 (Wiesbaden, 1983)), is a MS dating 1563–97 that includes a Məṣraf, but Hammerschmidt and Six do not say whether the contents include the melodic models. On the palaeography see Uhlig, Äthiopische Paläographie, p. 462.

⁴² These texts are edited without notation in Velat, Me'əraf, pp. 34–68, and are translated and discussed in Velat, Études sur le Me'əraf, pp. 218–66.

For two categories of Type IIA portions, selam and wazema, substantial remnants of collections survive in 15B, both of which are organised by liturgical year. These, together with 14A, represent ‘Stage I’ in the history of Type II, corresponding to Stage I in the history of Type I. In 15C we find the texts of all the Type Iia and Iib portions already incorporated into the earliest Dḁggwa manuscript. Since then they have remained among the normal contents of the Dḁggwa, though separate collections of individual categories did not die out completely.⁴³

At some unknown time, however, Type II chants also came to be understood as belonging to groupings known as betoch or ‘houses’. Portions belong to the same house when they have the same melodic incipit; the house itself came to be named for the textual incipit of a representative chant from the group. ‘Stage II’ took place when these houses began to be designated by written signs, each appearing in the margin next to the first line of the portion to which it applied. The earliest appearance of such signs is in the selam collection in 15B, in a hand different from that of the original scribe but nevertheless belonging to the fifteenth century. But, as can be seen in Figure 5, the written system had not yet been standardised. The first bet sign, B38 in our list, is completely written out except for its final letter – though it was this final letter that became the standard abbreviation in later sources. The second bet sign is an abbreviation of some sort (it consists of the letter qo written over the letter mē), but it cannot be identified with any bet known to us from twentieth-century sources of information.⁴⁴ On the other hand the third bet sign, B68 in our list, is already the one that became standard, the first letter of the complete word. The earliest source in which bet signs according to the standard system appear to have been written by the original scribe is 16B, but the majority of such signs even in this manuscript were clearly added by later hands.

The practice of classifying chants by melodic incipit is of course known also in medieval western Europe, where it competed with that of classifying melodies according to their final.⁴⁵ As Monson's discussion below indicates, the notion of 'final' is much less central in Ethiopian chant, though not completely absent. It is in any case quite useless for distinguishing the Ethiopian 'modes'. The bet system, on the other hand, is one of several indications that in Ethiopia it is the beginnings of melodies that are particularly important.

At some point the standard incipits of the bet system became linked to the standard melodic formulas with which the words 'halleluya' and 'For his mercy endures forever' were sung with each Type II portion. This was only natural, for in performance these prefatory formulas would have been followed immediately by the beginning of the portion itself. In Stage III, written lists of these 'halleluya' and 'For his mercy' formulas, supplied with musical notation, began to be drawn up, with each formula attached to its textual bet incipit, also with musical notation. Such a list is called Enqes'e Halleta ('The gate of the halleluya material'), but because each halleluya or refrain melody is linked to a bet it also serves as a list of bet and a guide to the bet system as a whole. The earliest manuscript in our list of sources to include such a halleluya list is ⁴⁴ Bet 23 in our list, els'iqo, is normally abbreviated qo, but there is no mē in this word. The Gəḏəz word qomē ('stop'), written exactly as shown in Figure 5, can be found in the margins of biblical manuscripts, where it signals the end of a pericope or liturgical reading (R. Zuurmond, Research into the Text of the Synoptic Gospels in Ge'ez, II (Delft and Faringdon, Oxon., 1987), p. 48; Uhlig, Äthiopische Paläographie, pp. 91–2.

17C, though a slightly earlier manuscript dates from A.D. 1667–8.⁴⁶ The list in 17C is already very similar to the Enqes'ε Hallela lists normally found in Dəggwa manuscripts from that time on. Not until printed books appear in the 1960s, however, do we find lists of the bet signs, giving all the marginal abbreviations according to 'mode' and identifying each with its fully spelled-out bet. This final development is 'Stage IV'. There are 123 bet signs in the list in 20D, but our chief informant evidently regarded some of them as duplications, for he sang only 114.

While we have not yet identified the sources of many of the betoč, it appears that they tend to be derived from portions of the mezmur category. Thus Bet 41, yəṭfeṣah' semay, to which the portion in our Figure 2 belongs, derives from the mezmur from the morning office (Meweddəs) for Easter (Fasika).⁴⁷ There are however some exceptions. Bet 68, wazema, is used for many portions of the wazema category; its source may be the wazema of the feast of the Four Heavenly Creatures, 8 Ḥədar.⁴⁸ Bet 97.3, engerari, which appears to duplicate Bet 91, qum engergari, seems to be used for the engerari or məlt'an category in general and not to have a specific source in one particular portion. But there is at least one example of a selam in this bet, sung at the end of the wazema (Vespers) office on Christmas (Lədet).⁴⁹ Bet 56, qedami zema, is derived from an eryam for Easter (Fasika),⁵⁰ even though the portions of the eryam category do not participate in the bet system.

The written history of the 'modes'. As explained above, all Ethiopian chants are assigned to one of three groupings that Westerners like to call 'modes', though in Ethiopic each grouping is called an 'order' (səlt) or 'chant' (zema).⁵¹ Traditionally these three zemat are attributed to St Yared. But they may have emerged more recently, and there may once have been only two modal classifications. The three modes $g\partial'\partial z$, ∂zl and $\varepsilon raray$ are all named in 15C. But earlier sources seem to know only $g\partial'\partial z$ and ∂zl , as if there were a time when only these two modes were in use. These sources include 14A, the selam collection in 15B and the early Zōmmare EMLL 2091 of the fifteenth or sixteenth century. The *Mestēgab*⁵², a selection of psalm verses memorised by boys in training as part of the Night Studies, also includes only $g\partial'\partial z$ and ∂zl sections, though we do not know when this collection was assembled. The collections of Type I chants in 13A and 15B name none of the modes, but identify some melodic groups as being 'in the second zema' (bē-kal ∂' zema) as if there were then only two zemat.⁵³ The possibility that there may once have been only two modes suggests an explanation for the names $g\partial'\partial z$ and ∂zl , which can be translated 'common' and 'apart' or 'special'.⁵⁴ The 'special' character of ∂zl may be connected with the fact that it is associated with particular seasons of the year.⁵⁴ Perhaps, then, there were originally only two modes, one used generally, the other restricted to certain special occasions. The name $\varepsilon raray$, thought to be an Amharic onomatopoeic term for crying in a high or loud voice,⁵⁵ may have arisen at a later time to designate the higher-range chants of the ∂zl group. Support for this view may be found in Monson's observation, reported below, that there are only two 'background pitch sets', one for $g\partial'\partial z$, the other for ∂zl and $\varepsilon raray$. This hypothesis needs to be confirmed by extensive investigation of the history of the modal designations and notations of portions now assigned to $\varepsilon raray$. In any case, three modes with the modern names already existed at the time 15C was copied.⁵⁶

⁵² On the other hand, an alternative interpretation is suggested by the selam and wazema collection in Paris MS d'Abbadie 87 (19th century). It is organised into $g\partial'\partial z$ (fol. 69a), bekal ∂' zema (77a), $\varepsilon raray$ (80a) and ∂zl (89b), suggesting that the 'second zema' is here regarded as a subdivision within $g\partial'\partial z$.

⁵⁶ Cerulli, La letteratura etiopica, p. 163, asserts that a late seventeenth-century revision of the Dəggwa, prepared by Qalē Ewadi at Debre Libanos, was especially concerned with the modes of the chant; but he cites no sources and we have no further information.

The development of the notation. Ethiopian traditions seem to say that the notation was invented by two priests, Gera and Ragu'el, who are said to have lived at some time during the sixteenth century.⁵⁷ The manuscript evidence is more or less consistent with this. Fifteenth-century manuscripts lack music notation altogether. The scribes who copied 16B and 16C evidently did not foresee the addition of notation, although it was added over some of their texts during the seventeenth century.⁵⁸ But in 16D and all subsequent manuscripts, the original scribe left space for the notation above each line of text, and this notation was actually entered during the copying of the text or shortly afterwards. The notation of 16A (late fifteenth or early sixteenth century) stands apart from that of all other known sources, however, and makes it an important manuscript for investigating the origins of the notation. Most of its məlǝkkət are not much later than the text itself, but they and especially the yefidel qərs' are notably more sparse than in other sources. The notator rarely bothered to indicate enbər at the ends of portions, for instance, and he wrote other signs very sparingly compared with later manuscripts. Indeed, in not a few places additional signs have been put in by scribes of later periods. A number of features confirm the impression that 16A witnesses to an early stage when the notational system was not yet fully developed. The yefidel qərs' are especially sparse: dəfat occurs very rarely, while deret, rəkrək and hədet seem not to have been used at all by the original notator. On the other hand, there are frequent vertical or slanted strokes both within and above the texts, which appear to have been deliberately intended to convey declamational information of some sort. Their frequency, combined with the limited use of the conventional signs, seem to indicate that this manuscript was notated at a time when the məlǝkkət system had already developed but the yefidel qərs' system was still being worked out.

The historical development of the yefidel qərs' and the məlǝkkət as written systems can be traced by following a single portion all the way through our series of dated manuscripts. Through such study one can learn much about the notational history of the chant.

⁵⁷ See discussion in note 29.

⁵⁸ Because most of the məlǝkkət are characters from the syllabary, they can be dated by the same palaeographical techniques used for dating Ethiopian texts; see Uhlig, Äthiopische Paläographie, pp. 539–40. However, the dating of scripts from before the seventeenth century is still difficult because dated landmarks are so rare.

Our Table 6 compares the notation of the first portion in the Dəggwa (the one illustrated above by Shelemay) as it occurs in all the notated sources on our list in Table 2.⁵⁹ The text is given beneath the notation of 20D, because this is the source our informant used to perform the portion. We begin with the rubric indicating the category of the chant (məlt'an in most manuscripts, wazema or məzmur in some) and its assignment to the feast of St John the Baptist (1 Məskərēm), the first day of the liturgical year. Then, most sources give the abbreviation for the bet, which is B41 in our list. After that, the indication ‘in 1’ means that the word ‘halleluya’ is sung once. Thereafter, the numbers preceded by a capital G represent mələkkət in the gəʕəz mode for which we have transcriptions. An asterisk after the number means that this particular place is the source (səreyyu) of the melodic formula associated with this mələkkət. The underlined syllables are transliterations of mələkkət for which we have no musical transcriptions, because our informant did not include them in his list. All the other symbols – dots, brackets and the rest – are yəfidel qərs'.

In the very earliest sources, the notation is sometimes inconsistent, as if a great variety of melodic traditions were in circulation. Our example is more consistent than most, perhaps because it is the first portion in the Dəggwa. 16D contains an especially large number of variants throughout all the portions we checked, as if it represented a tradition quite different from the one that became more or less standard. The most noteworthy early variant is the very first mələkkət in 16B, which is the syllable yu for səreyyu. A modern Ethiopian singer would presumably look to the text below and, seeing the words bəz'u'ə ente yoh'ennədsə, decide to sing the melodic formula he has memorised with these words. This would be formula G88 in our dictionary, but one that occurs at this place in no other source. Was it indeed what the scribe who notated 16B actually intended? The problem is complicated by the fact that bəz'u'ə ente yoh'ennədsə, ‘Blessed are you John’, is a textual formula, beginning a number of portions for this feast day and (with the name changed) many other feasts as well. But almost all of the portions for St John’s day that begin with this incipit, in all sources including 16B, are notated with the same mələkkət as our portion ⁵⁹ The complete chart will be published in Shelemay and Jeffery, Ethiopian Christian Liturgical Chant. Here we reproduce the chart for only the first two phrases of portion 1.

1, namely G186 followed by G200. The source, or sḍreyu, of G88 is one of the erbaʿt portions included in Ye-qal Tḍmhḍrt, assigned to the following Sunday.⁶⁰

As the chart for portion 1 shows, much of the notation had stabilised by the seventeenth century, except at certain points that for some reason continued to vary over time. At one point in this portion, at the text bēʿḍntiʿenḍ wḍstē rḍʿḍse (not reproduced in Table 6), the manuscripts not only differ among themselves, but often contain mḍlḍkkḍt that are not to be found in our list. Once achieved, the overall notational stability lasted through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and into the nineteenth. In the late nineteenth and the twentieth centuries, many more signs came to be added to the notation, as if singers were beginning to lose their grip on the tradition, and compensated by attempting to notate as specifically as possible. Our example has experienced less of this than other portions, but on p. 2 it will be noted that the two most recent sources, 20D and 20F, contain mḍlḍkkḍt not found earlier: G195, the unlisted mḍlḍkkḍt hḍya, G119, G151. 20F also shares G60 with 20B.

Once the notation is understood it is possible to seek a better understanding of how the Type I and Type II groups actually function. Table 7 compares the notation of the first melodic model for the eryam category, portion 12 in our forthcoming anthology, with several other eryam texts that take the portion 12 melody for their model. Boxes outline places where the melodies agree with portion 12, and it will be readily observed that these are more common towards the beginning of each portion. The use of A1 for the final cadence is very common among portions in the eraray mode; its presence in four of our six examples should not be overrated. However, only extensive study will determine how typical portion 12 is of the Ethiopian repertory as a whole.

Table 8 compares a Type IIa portion (our no. 1, the same one as illustrated in Table 6) with the portion that serves as the source of its bet (B15), where the notation represents no single source but is conflated from several twentieth-century manuscripts. The two have of course the same halleluya melisma, with the word ‘halleluya’ being sung only once. They agree in having G200 near the beginning, and G63 followed by G11 in the middle of the chant. Interestingly, they also agree in having the sources of two formulas (sḍreṣyu) close to the end (note the asterisks), though the two formulas are different in each case. Beyond that there is little similarity. Clearly the relationship between a Type II portion and the source of its bet is even looser than the relationship between a Type I portion and its melodic model. To the very limited degree that we can generalise from these two portions, it would seem that a bet is not a model at all, but governs only the halleluya and (loosely) the incipit. Indeed, comparison of Table 8 with Table 7 suggests that, in Ethiopian chant, similarities tend to cluster near the beginnings of the related portions. There is other evidence to support this impression. However, some of the other chants in our sample illustrate cases where portions sharing the same bet have a great deal more in common with each other than the two portions in Table 8.

INGRID MONSON

EVIDENCE FROM THE MODERN ORAL TRADITION

Ethiopian Christian chant is an example of a musical system whose notation was never intended to replace oral transmission. The alphabetic abbreviations known as mḍlḍkkḍt are used to index a corpus of conventionalised melodic phrases, which are themselves drawn from whole source chants. Unless the Ethiopian musician is performing the source portion itself, he must accommodate new text to the phrases while singing. Competence in Ethiopian chant performance, accordingly, is acquired by memorising a repertory of phrases, learning the alphabetical abbreviations for these melodies, and developing the ability to recall and sing these phrases on new texts with the aid of the mḍlḍkkḍt notation and a set of ten additional signs, yḗfidel qḍrs', here termed ‘conventional signs’.

Study of the notational system is carried out only after the Ethiopian church musician has learned many portions as whole chants. The notation, once learned, appears to facilitate the acquisition of additional repertory.

Transcriptions of eighteen liturgical portions, a pedagogical list of 558 məlǝkkət from the Bethlehem school (hereafter called the dictionary), and a comparative list of fifty-seven məlǝkkət, including performances by practitioners in the Qoma and Achaber schools, will be used here to illustrate various features of the musical system as perpetuated in the Ethiopian Christian oral tradition.

The first part of this discussion attempts to define ‘mode’ as it applies to Ethiopian chant. The second part discusses a single liturgical portion and its notation in detail. In the final section, a comparative sample is used to identify both the range of variation between renditions by one musician at different times, and between three different musicians performing the same material.

A definition of mode. The Amharic word səlt, which can be rendered as ‘mode’, applies to the indigenous classification of the məlǝkkət and portions into three musical categories. The word zema, which in its general sense means sacred chant, can also be used to mean mode. A metaphor associating the three modes with the Holy Trinity is operative in Ethiopian chant: the gǝʿǝz mode represents God the Father; ʿǝzl God the Son; and ɛraray the Holy Spirit.⁶¹

Musically, gǝʿǝz distinguishes itself from ɛraray and ʿǝzl by possessing a different background pitch set. ɛraray and ʿǝzl are, in turn, differentiated from each other by liturgical function and register: they both use the same background pitch set, but ʿǝzl is employed primarily during Lent and Holy Week.

For the Ethiopian church musician the identity of the modes is expressed in the məlǝkkət melodies and the portions. There is no indigenous classification of the pitch material within these melodies, although a pitch set differentiation between gǝʿǝz and the other modes is tacitly and rigorously observed in practice. My description of pitch usage in the Ethiopian modes is therefore an analytical convenience and is not to be confused with indigenous notions of scale or melody type.

$G\partial'\partial z$ is the most frequently occurring mode, accounting for approximately half (287) of the 558 signs in the dictionary. Example 7 sets out the pitch set used in $g\partial'\partial z$. It consists of a series of thirds,⁶² represented here as $a'-c''-e''$ (in semibreves) which serve as the most common points of resolution for $g\partial'\partial z$ melodies ($g\sharp$ occasionally appears as a point of resolution as well). The chromatic auxiliary notes around the outer fifth ($g\sharp'$ and bb' around a' , and $d\sharp''$ and f'' around e'') embellish this mode, as can be seen in the example $m\partial l\partial k k\partial t$ shown in Example 7. There is often indifference over whether embellishment of the note is above or below the principal note, suggesting that for the Ethiopian musician variations of this type do not compromise the melodic identity of the sign (cf. example $m\partial l\partial k k\partial t$ G13, final three notes, and G25 on syllable $s\epsilon$). The middle member of the series of thirds (c'') is not decorated by half-steps. This note is the returning tone, or final in the $g\partial'\partial z$ mode.⁶³ In the notation, cadential patterns and the returning tone are indicated with $\epsilon nb\partial r$, one of the ten conventional signs. The true distance of this pitch from the first in the series of thirds tends to be slightly larger than a minor third. On occasion it is as large as a major third.

⁶² The expression 'series of thirds' is a modification of Curt Sachs's notion of 'chain of thirds' (Sachs, 'Primitive and Medieval Music: a Parallel', JAMS, 13 (1960), pp. 42–9; The Wellsprings of Music, ed. J. Kunst, repr. of 1962 edn (New York, 1977)). It is intended to describe the pitches which serve as points of melodic resolution in the $g\partial'\partial z$ mode, in the absence of an indigenous term. Sachs defines 'chain' as follows: 'the melody has a formative kernel, usually a third or fourth; when the singer expands the range of his melody beyond this kernel, he often feels compelled to add a similar interval above or below, thus creating a double third or a double fourth and, onward, . . . [includes possibility of chain of 3–6 like intervals]' ('Primitive and Medieval Music', p. 45). Sachs's exposition requires revision for two reasons: (1) it does not include a notion of octave duplication (which occurs frequently in Ethiopian chant), and (2) it is used to articulate a theory for the historical development of melody cross-culturally on the speculative and evolutionary assumption that melodies expanded outward from small intervals and are filled in from larger ones (The Wellsprings of Music, pp. 143–58, 72, 51–2). H. van der Werf, The Emergence of Gregorian Chant (Rochester, NY, 1983), pp. 109–20, has apparently borrowed this term from Sachs along with aspects of Sachs's ideas concerning historical priority as applied to Gregorian chant. Sachs, however, includes the notion of points of melodic repose connected by 'passage' notes ('Primitive and Medieval Music', p. 45), which is useful in the Ethiopian case and is not included in the idea of 'octave species'. I thank Peter Jeffery for citations and for assistance in clarifying this point.

⁶³ In Ethiopian secular music, the term melash means 'returning tone' (A. Kebede, 'The Bowl-Lyre of Northeast Africa – Krar: the Devil's Instrument', Ethnomusicology, 21 (1977), pp. 389–91).

Defining eraray and $\partial z l$ is more problematic, largely owing to difficulties in translating Ethiopian intonation into Western notation. Eraray and $\partial z l$ both use the same pitch set, $c'-d'-f'-g'-a'$ or $c'-d'-e'-g'-a'$, as rendered in staff notation (see Example 7). Ambiguity in these modes, from the analyst's perspective, is the product of two factors. First, the actual intonation of the intervals $d'-f'$ and $d'-e'$ is often in between these two Western pitches, so much so that whether the Western ear should resolve the ambiguity towards the second or the minor third in the transcriptions has often been a point of disagreement in the research team. We had the interval measured on a Fairlight Voicetracker. It is indeed often exactly halfway between a major second and a minor third.⁶⁴ These two pitch sets, rendered in staff notation, are often observed as substitutes for one another. See, for example, Example 7, where the melody of sign A58 is shown in the dictionary using pitch set 1 and in one of the portions with pitch set 2. The signs proceed identically until the fifth pitch of the set is introduced. Secondly, the typical cadential gesture of a descent and return of a minor third can occur at two places within any given form of the pitch set: c' and f' within set 1, or c' and g' in pitch set 2, making it difficult to establish a returning tone for any $m\partial l\partial k k\partial t$ in isolation.⁶⁵ Selecting a comparative transposition level for the $m\partial l\partial k k\partial t$ was difficult, particularly in light of the fact that eraray is additionally said to be the mode with the highest register.⁶⁶ Only in the portions, which indicate returning tone with the symbol $\epsilon n b\partial r$, has it been possible to observe the apparent predominance of pitch set 2 in characterising the mode. It may, in fact, be better to think of these modes as a pentatonic collection with a variable third degree.

The performance of a liturgical portion. To illustrate the many musical issues involved in performing Ethiopian chant, liturgical portion 7 from our sample will be examined in some detail. Portion 7 is an engergari for Christmas in the $g\partial'\partial z$ mode. The word engergari is evidently derived from an Amharic word which connotes agitation or excitement,⁶⁷ and is often used for chants that are linked to major feast days.

⁶⁴ We thank Dr Kathryn Vaughn, who carried out this work at the University of California, Los Angeles.

⁶⁵ This cadential gesture is observable at the end of each $m\partial l\partial k k\partial t$ in Example 7.

An internal textual-musical repeat called a məlt'an is a formal feature that portion 7 shares with many others in our sample. The musical repeat is usually notated in one of two ways – either with a double line of notation over the part of the text to be repeated, or by placing the abbreviation for məlt'an (məlt) at the end of the portion. When the latter convention is used, the second part is written out again. In our example, Ḫēqa Berhanu sang from a source called Yeziq Mes'h'af, a collection of important parts of the Dəggwa for holidays.⁶⁸ This particular source has an incomplete double line of notation beginning at the məlt'an; consequently, Ḫēqa Berhanu did not sing the repeat. The məlt'an, however, is notated in all but five of the manuscripts examined by Peter Jeffery. The notation that Ḫēqa Berhanu sang from is shown in Figure 6. Throughout the portions analysed for this project, the music for the məlt'an repeat is generally very similar to the first presentation, despite some notational contrast.

Portion 7 is one of the shorter chants in our sample, partly because Berhanu Makonnen chose not to sing the repeat. The top line of each system of Example 8 presents a transcription of Ḫēqa Berhanu's singing of portion 7. The bottom lines show the dictionary entry for each məlǝkkət. The məlt'an would begin on system 3 (marked with an M). In each section, portion and məlt'an, the məlǝkkət move to gradually lower points of resolution. In the first section of the portion the məlǝkkət come to rest first on c' (as notated here), then g#', and finally on e' just before the məlt'an. At this point Berhanu returns to the opening e'', emphasising the high register until coming to rest on c'' (beginning of third system). From this moment onwards, Berhanu sings a gradually lower set of melodic resolutions that are more extended than those of section 1. The melisma on lo of zelottu (beginning of system 4) comes to rest on a'; the melisma on tu of lottu (beginning of system 5) comes to a halt on e'. The last phrase continues the descent to come to rest on c', the lowest note of the portion. This sequence of progressively lower melodic resolutions with lengthier melismas in the second half of portions or subsections of portions is a common feature of gǝ'ǝz mode portions, and appears to be a conventionalised practice.

Musical notation for the second system of the song 'Gharbi'. It consists of two staves. The top staff is in treble clef with a key signature of one sharp (F#) and a tempo of 62. The melody continues with notes and rests, including a fermata over a whole note. The bottom staff is in bass clef with a key signature of one sharp and a tempo of 80. It features a triplet of eighth notes. Below the staves, the lyrics are written in both Latin and Arabic script.

Portion 7 exhibits a very high degree of correspondence between the dictionary məlǝkkət and the signs as performed in the portion. Allowing for octave displacement, eight signs match the dictionary entries with great exactness. These signs are marked with an asterisk on the dictionary lines of Example 8. Three signs are examples of sǝreyu, a designation indicating that this occurrence is the source text of the sign. These məlǝkkət are marked with an 'x' in Example 8.

In system 2 and the beginning of system 3, it will be noted that signs G279, G182 and G13 apply to the same musical phrase. The dictionary entries for these məlǝkkət are all very similar. Since G13 is the only sign that begins on the same pitch as the portion melody, it appears that Ələqa Berhanu has chosen to sing G13 and to bypass G279 and G182. Likewise, in system 3, G249 and G261 resemble each other very closely. Berhanu has apparently chosen G261, although in this case the signs are nearly identical. Such situations, including examples where the skipped məlǝkkət does not resemble the chosen sign, are quite common throughout the eighteen portions in our sample. A knowledge of which məlǝkkət are substitutable or equivalent to one another appears to be essential to the performance practice of Ethiopian chant.

In performance, one also finds contraction and expansion of the melodies associated with the signs. The portion melody for G66 (system 3) makes use of only the first word of the dictionary entry for the sign (cf. wəḏʾətu in the portion with bəḍəro in the məlǝkkət). In contrast, the portion melody for G230 (see system 4, zəlottu) represents an expansion of the dictionary version of the məlǝkkət. Finally, G122 (system 5, beginning) corresponds to the last part of the dictionary entry only: the melisma on the last syllable of the sign.

The sign in the margin of the notation (ri) is a bet or ‘house’ sign. It indicates a melodic incipit, which in this case exactly matches the məlǝkkət G259.⁶⁹ In portions with halleluyas, the bet indicates the melody to which a halleluya is sung. In some portions in our sample these incipits recur at phrase beginnings, even if the beginnings of the məlǝkkət are somewhat modified in the process. In this way the bet seem to provide a source of melodic continuity and may aid the singer in synthesising the portion.

For most signs, the məlǝkkət melody is applied to a different text and consequently the singer must adjust the text of the portion to the melody of the sign. The textual placement in the sign seems to guide that of the portion, but often discrepancies exist between the length of the portion text and that of the sign. Syllabic quantification does not appear to play a critical role in such accommodation. The conventional signs of yəfidel qərs, however, appear to play an important role in textual placement.

Example 9 presents examples of five of the ten conventional signs drawn from the portion sample. The musical contexts in which these signs appear in the portions have helped us to draw some tentative conclusions about their functions. I will start with the most consistent sign, chʾəret (see Example 9a). In every case, chʾəret indicates the syllable on which a melisma begins. Hədet (Example 9b) apparently indicates that many syllables must be quickly sung in the məlǝkkət melody. Yəzat (Example 9c) is somewhat puzzling. It occurs frequently in the portion sample, yet not in a uniform musical context. Berhanu’s definitions – ‘you must stop’ or ‘you must hold your voice on one letter’⁷⁰ – suggest that it may indicate a stressed or prolonged syllable, although in many portions this is not very audible. Two conventional signs, dərs and enbər, have specific melodies associated with them (Example 9d and e). These signs, which indicate that a melodic cadence should be sung, have versions appropriate to each mode: one version serves for eraray and ‘əzl; another serves for gə‘əz. Dərs actually has an equivalent in the mələkkət: G261; several other mələkkət appear to have functions that relate to the conventional signs as well. This suggests that there has been a tendency for the mələkkət to incorporate some of the musical features originally indicated by conventional signs.

The most important observations emerging from this discussion are (1) that the Ethiopian musician makes many of his own decisions in the course of realising the mələkkət, (2) that the conventional signs are most important in textual placement and indication of important melodic cadences, (3) that musical structure follows textual structure very closely and (4) that the bet may play an important role in the musical continuity of portions which use them.

A comparative sample. Fifty-seven mələkkət sung by representatives of the three extant regional styles – Bethlehem, Qoma and Achaber – provide comparative data for this study. The Bethlehem singer, Berhanu Makonnen, is the same musician who sang the dictionary. Comparing Əleqa Berhanu’s renditions of the signs on two occasions several months apart allows us to see what type of variation occurs in his singing of the signs themselves. Of twenty-nine mələkkət in the gə‘əz mode, for which we have comparative information, only two exhibit variations that threaten the identity of the sign. Two are more extended in one rendition than the other. Example 10a displays two mələkkət sung by Berhanu Makonnen three months apart. G198 shows variation that affects the identity of the melody, while G219 is an example of melodic extension in one version. Allowing for equivalences in mode, general rhythmic character and octave displacement, the remaining mələkkət are nearly identical. In the eraray and ‘əzl mələkkət in the sample, extension of the sign is the only significant type of variation. Əleqa Berhanu is remarkably consistent in his rendition of the signs.

regional styles – Bethlehem, Qoma and Achaber – exhibit greater variety, as might be expected. Example 10b shows four məlǝkkət from the comparative sample. The Qoma and Achaber styles tend to be more melismatic and extended than the predominant Bethlehem style, confirming singers’ testimony that these two minority styles are ‘longer’ than Bethlehem. There is both sufficient general and specific correspondence between the signs, however, to suggest that the three schools are closely related (cf. G170 and G248; A97 and A140). While both oral tradition and documentary sources suggest that Bethlehem is the oldest style, it is important to note that similarities are probably the product of both common ancestry and contact in the modern performance tradition. It is not uncommon for church musicians from different regional styles to sing in the same church in the Ethiopian capital.⁷¹

There is one more comparative sample that should be mentioned. In 1951, Bernard Velat recorded an accomplished Bethlehem debtera singing more than 500 of the məlǝkkət. He published transcriptions of about half of them.⁷² I have compared many of these transcriptions with my own and have found a great deal of consistency in the məlǝkkət. Example 10c includes two məlǝkkət as rendered by Berhanu Makonnen and Velat’s informant. While there is more variation than between Berhanu’s two samples, given three months apart, the melodies are readily recognisable within the parameters previously mentioned. These transcriptions, made twenty-five years before our məlǝkkət were recorded, suggest that the Ethiopian notational system succeeds in transmitting a relatively stable musical corpus. The məlǝkkət seem to confine melodic variation to relatively small units.

CONCLUSIONS

These observations, and indeed our entire project, have only scraped the surface of Ethiopic chant, which is in almost every way a subject as vast as Gregorian chant. We felt like archaeologists digging test pits in order to plan an excavation; the excavation itself has barely even begun.

Concerning the nature of Ethiopian chant as a musical and notational system, it appears that it intends to transmit a relatively fixed corpus of chants with identifiable and reproducible melodic content. We have seen that the melodies of the mäläkkät seem to be quite stable within and between schools. The variations observed do not compromise the audible identity of the melody in most cases, and as such illustrate a distinction developed by Bruno Nettl and discussed by Harold Powers, between 'performing a version' of something and 'improvising upon something'.⁷³ Both are species of improvisation, in the sense that new melodic material may be constructed, but the intention of the former is to realise something relatively fixed and stable, while the latter actively values new invention. If, in order to describe degrees of improvisation, a continuum from nearly fixed to nearly random is posited, Ethiopian chant would occupy a position not far from the fixed end of the spectrum.

It may be asked to what extent the Ethiopian musician carries the musical tradition in his memory as whole chants, or to what extent he re-synthesises portions with the aid of the mäläkkät notation each time he performs. Whether the macro- or micro-context is viewed as the one that generates musical performance, the musical content of this tradition is carried completely in the memory of the singer, since the text-based character of the mäläkkät notation provides no visual indication of the contour of the melody.

If the mäläkkät are seen as the building-blocks from which the singer creates a chant, there is ample evidence of oral compositional decisions. The Ethiopian musician must know which mäläkkät resemble one another, which mäläkkät are redundant, when to sing only the beginning or end of a sign, how to interpret the conventional signs, when and how to make use of the bet, how to place the text, and when melismatic extensions are appropriate – all of this in addition to knowing and being able to recall the 500-plus mäläkkät themselves.

If the macro-context is viewed as potentially more important, it might be argued that the Ethiopian musician does not synthesise a portion anew each time he sings, any more than a pianist is 'reading' a piece he or she has played innumerable times. The pedagogical tradition of the repertory also suggests this viewpoint: children learning the tradition begin by acquiring portions as a whole. Only after there has been some mastery at that level does the student begin a study of the notation. Apprehension of the notation, in turn, facilitates the learning of additional repertory.

If transmission in whole chants appears to be the most important process, however, the analyst must explain the persistence of the mäläkkät system of notation over several centuries. Surely, a system that is not useful would not survive. It therefore seems only reasonable to suggest that the macro- and micro-musical memories of this tradition effectively reinforce one another; this, in fact, may be the central utility of the Ethiopian notational system. The Ethiopian church musician learns repertory in an order which integrates memories of whole chants with memories of chants in fragments – from two directions, as it were. If global memory fails, the mäläkkät notation can serve as a means by which the musician re-synthesises vaguely remembered chants, and if local memory fails, recollection of the broader outline of the chant may help reconstruct the detail. There is probably much individual variation in which type of memory prevails.

The many contributions by individual musicians to the perpetuation and performance of the Ethiopian chant tradition took place within a broader historical framework. In the earliest recorded stage ('Stage I'), the different categories of portions were assembled into separate collections that could be organised either by melodic group or by liturgical year. The oldest such collection is from about the thirteenth century, and we do not know how much farther back such collections may once have existed, either orally or in writing.

By the fifteenth century, a representative portion had been identified for each melodic group ('Stage II'), becoming either a 'melodic model' in the case of Type I chants or the source of a bet or 'house' in the case of Type II. However, the 'models' system of Type I had achieved its standard form by the fifteenth century, whereas the house system of Type II – at least the written signs for it – did not stabilise until the sixteenth century. The first liturgical chant book incorporating all the categories is from the fifteenth century.

The notation was apparently developed in the sixteenth century, and has been an integral part of chant manuscripts ever since. It was also in the seventeenth century that written lists of the melodic models and the houses began to be made ('Stage III') providing overall structures for both systems. Thus the Ethiopian chant repertory had achieved its classic written form by the seventeenth century, which is called the 'Gondar period' by Ethiopian historians after the name of the new Ethiopian capital established at Gondar by the Emperor Fasilidas in 1635.

There is no doubt that the Ethiopian chant tradition and changes in its transmission process have been directly shaped by events in Ethiopian cultural history. The emergence of notation in the sixteenth century, although perhaps anticipated by earlier developments, appears to represent a direct attempt to sustain the musical tradition in the tragic aftermath of the Muslim invasion.

Available documentary sources suggest that the first seventy-five years of the Gondar period, culminating in the reign of Emperor Iyasu I, saw the construction of churches and castles as Gondar both influenced and absorbed an array of regional styles.⁷⁴ Royal support and demand for artistic and liturgical artefacts encouraged musicians to produce more notated manuscripts just as it encouraged the development of distinctive Gondarene styles of painting and iconography.⁷⁵ The technological innovation represented by the mäläkkät and their proliferation during the Gondar period can be seen as part of a broader cultural trend towards literacy, but one that at the same time continued to encode meaning simultaneously in oral transmission. Likewise, the increasing numbers of manuscripts containing musical notation dating from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries are only part of the residue of a broader transition from oral transmission to increased use of writing.⁷⁶

⁷⁶ A recent analysis of the Amdämta Commentary corpus, a body of vernacular commentaries on Gəʾəz biblical and patristic texts, suggest that these commentaries were initially orally transmitted but reached their definitive written form during the Gondar era. R. Cowley, The Traditional Interpretation of the Apocalypse of St. John in the Ethiopian Church (Cambridge, 1983), pp. 23, 31.

Despite the decline of the Gondar monarchs' power in the late eighteenth century, their city continued to be a cultural centre and a site for musical innovation. But with the shift of the Ethiopian capital to Addis Ababa in 1887, the impact of governmental policies of centralisation⁷⁷ also encouraged increasing consolidation of the chant tradition.

In the late twentieth century, few debtēras perpetuate regional chant traditions as the Bethlehem style increasingly predominates. There is little doubt that the twentieth-century transmission of the chant tradition in Addis Ababa has served both to standardise and to normalise surviving oral tradition, while encouraging increasing notational detail. The 1974 revolution and the end of the monarchy that patronised the church introduced a dramatic new socio-economic situation that has already altered transmission of the church musical system.⁷⁸

Ethiopian chant is an example of a musical system whose notation was never intended to replace oral transmission. The məḷəkkət can be viewed as a conventionalised melodic repertory that assists and succeeds in the goal of transmitting a relatively fixed and stable liturgical corpus. The development of this notational system occurred in a specifically Ethiopian context and reflects particularly Ethiopian values concerning orality, flexibility and authority. The value of Ethiopian chant to comparative studies may lie in the portrait it provides of a highly constrained, notated, literate, yet orally transmitted repertory.

St. Yared the Melodious

St. Yared (501–576). While growing up, Yared had difficulty grasping the basics of the alphabet. He gave up on his education. But according to a popular story, he was inspired to persevere academically while watching an ant successfully crawl up the bark of a tree after six failed attempts.^[1] He eventually became a prominent scholar best known for his musical compositions, and some attributed his many compositions to supernatural revelation. His later disciples invented a musical notation and a form of liturgical dance (aquwaquam) in addition to starting an academy at Bete Qetin. His antiphonary books including the main one that is known as Degguwa also contributed to the school of Qene poetry in Ge'ez.

Yaredian texts in Ethiopia and Africa remain one of the most influential, important liturgical antiphonary corpuses and yet they are not known elsewhere particularly in the English-speaking world. There is no English translation available of the Yaredic corpus. The Yaredic corpus exists in manuscript and printed forms and is still used in the liturgical services in Ethiopia.

There is a poetic bend in patristic hymnography be it Latin or Greek. But poetry is more pervasive in the Syriac and Ethiopic traditions. In Ethiopia this poetic-hymnodic tradition is attributed to St. Yared the Melodious.

St. Yared is the Father of Ethiopian traditional church education. He is the pioneer for the school of interpretation, hymnody, liturgical dance and Qene or Ge'ez oral poetry. The poetic-hymnographic tradition that was pioneered by St. Yared left an enduring legacy including on the exegesis of the Scripture in the liturgy, biblical exegesis and poetry tradition in Ethiopia.

St. Yared (501- 576) was born in Axum, the ancient capital and sacred city of Ethiopia. Yared descended from a priestly family.[2] Yared's early education and revelation is captured both in oral memories, icons, and hagiographies. His life is briefly sketched in his Vita (Dersan wagadl zayared, 'Homily and Acts of Yared') published by Conti Rosini in 1904.[3] The legendary story of St. Yared told in variations and according to Hailu Habtu is as follows:

Yared (501 – 576 A. D.) was born in Axum, Ethiopia's ancient capital and sacred city, and his family was from a continuous line of priests. As was the prevalent custom in such cases, he was sent to a church school early on. Legend has it, however, that he found the mastery of the alphabet difficult and that he could never have succeeded, had he not drawn the right moral from the contendings of a little worm. Yared observed the worm trying to climb up a tree trunk, but falling mid-way to the top every time it tried. But the little worm persisted. It tried again and again, and again. Nonetheless, it kept falling down repeatedly until, at last, it triumphed on the seventh attempt. Were it not for the lesson that little worm taught him, we would never have known of Yared or listened to his spiritually edifying music today.[4]

He went to the church school to study under his uncle, Gedion. But legend tells that Yared had struggled to grasp the reading and memorization of the Psalms – an elementary education.[5] Some contemporary commentators on ETV documentaries have argued such a legendary story of a natural/supernatural encounter is a blasphemy to the intellect of Yared. He could have been a late-bloomer. Also, the story illustrates the connection of the divine encounter through scripture and nature, which is part and parcel of ancient Christianity. The pursuit of the intellect and having a supernatural encounter were not mutually exclusive. Moreover, the lesson he learned from an ant is that of virtue, namely an intellectual courage and humility. He returned to his teacher, submitting himself to his master and apologizing (intellectual humility). Concurrently, the mystery of the books of the Scripture, both the Old and New Testament, was revealed to him. He mastered the interpretation of the Scripture (both Old and New Testament), before he invented his music and hymnody. Also, Yared was the founder of an academy at Bete-Qetin, in Aksum.

Yared's composition of music and hymnody also was infused with the divine encounter and mystical experiences of the divine liturgy. The sick were healed, those who were mourning were consoled. The famous icon depicts the king, mesmerized by the melody, piercing Yared, but Yared the Melodius was so enveloped by the contemplation he did not notice it. Even the birds of the air were mesmerized by his singing. Yaredic music has been used as part of the divine liturgy for the last 1,500 years in Ethiopian Orthodox Churches in Ethiopia, Eritrea and elsewhere in the Diaspora. The scriptural basis and the spiritual encounter may reveal why the hymnody continues to enrich the traditional schools and liturgical worship across generations. Yaredic music, hymnography and liturgical dance are all part of Ethiopian Christianity.[6] Here it is fitting to Yared to compare the dominant attitude of ancient Christianity and the church father's reservations at using musical instruments in the Divine Liturgy with the Ethiopian Orthodox Church who is indebted to Yared for he is a musician, hymnographer and poet-theologian.[7] The three dominant musical instruments are the prayer staff or the Tau-cross, the sistrum and the drum. Besides music, Yared is often credited for invention of Qene/ poetry.

Besides deggwa, Yared is regarded by Ge'ez (Ethiopic) scholars as the founder of qiné [Qene], a very high, elaborate, strict and multi-layered form [sic] of Ge'ez poetry that is cryptic, complex, profound and rich in allusions to religion, legend, history, law, social customs, etc, and generally to the human condition. Following Yared, Yohannes of Gebela in Wollo, and Tewanei of Deg Istifa in Gojam are reputed to have enriched it and made it even more complex and rigorous.[8]

The poetic nature of Yaredic hymnography shall be explored further. Of course, later generations elaborated further the system of poetry as they did with hymnography.[9]

Yared's Hymnographic Corpus

The five hymnodic works are Deggwa, Tsome Degwa, Mieraf, Zemare and Mewasit. They are used for different liturgical occasions including funerary liturgy, feasts, and the liturgical year and seasons of Ethiopia. Hailu Habtu in his introduction noted: "Yared, the polyglot of nature's varied sounds, incorporated in his hymns reflections and observations of nature and its kaleidoscopic phenomena, all to the glory of the Creator. Thus, his compositions reflect the periodicity of the seasons, and of the agricultural cycle." [10]

The agricultural cycle includes the rainy season, (mid-June to mid-September), and that of the harvest or the flower season, (mid-September to mid-December). According to Daniel Assefa, such contextual seasonal and agricultural thought weaved to salvation history is strong evidence for the indigenous innovation of the Yaredic antiphony.

How Hymnography of the Angels Was Revealed to St. Yared

According to the Ethiopian tradition, on Hidar the 5th, by the will of God to be praised by the people of Ethiopia, three white birds by the name of Aropion were sent from heaven to Yared. The three birds were hovering above where Yared was teaching and they spoke to him in Ge'ez saying: "Oh Yared, you are blessed, the one who conceived you is blessed; blessed is the breast that fed you!"[11] He was told to, "call the new name of God, Jesus Christ and you will learn to recite the hymnody of the 24 heavenly priests." [12] Like the Apostle Paul his calling and ordination comes directly from the Lord Jesus Christ. [13]

Generally speaking, Deggwa and its division is twofold: seasonal and liturgical. His Deggwa begins with a hymn of wonder over the divine hymn he encountered. It is believed he was taken to heaven (ascended) during contemplation to the heaven and experienced the divine liturgy, and the hymns of the angels. He expressed his wonder of that heavenly encounter in the following hymn.

Oh! Music! ...

Ah! Music that I heard the angels sing in Heaven

Uttering Holy! Holy! Holy! Lord!

The Heavens and the Earth are filled with

Your holy praise. [14]

One can see Yared's deep sense of wonder after seeing the divine liturgy. After this transcendent and mystical encounter, he began to compose new poetic-hymns full of symbolism, taken both from nature and scripture. Then, Yared went to Zion Church of Aksum, lifted up his hands and offered praise with a loud voice: "Alleluia, praise to the Father, praise to the Son and praise to the Holy Spirit." [15] He also improvised a song that connects creation, sabbath and the (tabot) Ark.

In the beginning, God made the Heaven and the Earth;

And having completed all, He rested on the Sabbath;
And Said He to Noah at the onset of the Flood:
“Build yourself an Ark by which you may be saved.” [16]

The hymn connects the story of creation and redemption, with the Ark of Noah representing salvation. The place where he composed his song is known as ሞላዊ ባለ murade qal. This place is still preserved in the memory of the EOTC. The beginning of his composition is also dated with reference to the specific time of the hour. It was Hidar 6 of 534 E.C. (Ethiopian Calendar).

Yaredic Melodies, Musical and Seasonal Symbolisms

The major Yaredic melodies represent persons of the Trinity. The three melodies that are known as Ge’ez, Izl and Araray respectively represent the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Ge’ez melody (not the language) symbolizing the Father is a hard, stark and dry melody. Ethiopian scholars of the Yaredic corpus note that the Father is the source of the Trinity.[17] The melody of Ge’ez is meant to evoke the symbol of the Father and it is hard stern, stark and dry. The second one that symbolizes the Son is Izl, representing one who is soft, gentle and full of love. The melody of Izl is tender, mellow and comforting – a representation of the Incarnate Word who endured suffering on the cross. The Araray is a symbolic melody for the Holy Spirit, and “is often described as plaintive, verging almost on melancholic... its plaintive and almost melancholic quality.” The Araray melody is used for occasions like lent, passion week and funerals. Though, the three are the basic melodies, there are several sub-melodies in the Yaredic musical system. The following are sample Yaredic seasonal and liturgical hymns.

About Rain

Listen to the sound of the footsteps of the rain
When the rains pour down, the poor rejoice.
Listen to the sound of the footsteps of the rain!
When the rains pour down, the hungry are satiated ...

About Cloud

The clouds hear and obey His word;
And the streams brim with water,
And the furrows quench their thirst ...

About Harvest

In its own time, the rainy season has passed.
Now is established the season of plenty.
Behold! The plants have blossomed and brought forth fruit ...

He has bedecked the sky with stars;
And the earth, He has adorned with flower

Scripture and Nature (Yared's encounter with the Divine and Nature) are joined to the salvation story. The following nativity hymn taken from the gospel itself provides the basis for combining nature and salvation history.

The star became a guide
And, to them, a herald of joy.

According to Hailu Habtu the legacy of St. Yared has three dimensions as follow: Yared’s corpus of hymns has remained basically table, as have the chants he composed and the dance movements he set. However, this does not mean that is has been completely static. Additions and innovations took place at least in a few important areas: (1) in the text itself (2) in the system of notation and (3) in the duration of the curriculum.
